Mrs. Brandon also writes that the Eclair Company is top price. She writes:

> A great many companies indulge in vague statements of the vast sums which they pay for scripts. I have never yet been able to substantiate these claims, although I have questioned free-lance playwrights whose contributions are considered to be the best obtainable.
> There is no company paying more than the ECLAIR does; and few companies pay as promptly. We are constantly in the market for:
> Two-reel psychological dramas.
> Two-reel modern society dramas.
> Single reel scenarios for our companies of juveniles.
> Single and double-reel scenarios for our Western companies, operating in Arizona.
> These must contain heart interest or punch—or better yet—both, judiciously bound together by unusual situations that will fit our leads and can be contrived at reasonable cost.

We don't know what sort of free lances Mrs. Brandon has been talking comes disgusted with society and determines to live among the poor—to discover whether or not there is any character—and to satisfy his curiosity. Grace Meridith, a society belle, had known Frank all her life, in fact the two families had decided long ago that Frank and Grace should wed when they were old enough.

Early one morning when he and his society friends were leaving a social function, Frank discovered a young newsboy giving a beggar some pennies. This gave him an insight into the other side of life, which made him decide right then and there to live among the poorer classes to find REAL life. His evening suit is discarded and substituted for a very plain unfashionable suit. Frank sends a note to his fiancee, telling her that he is leaving town on business and will be gone a few days. Going back to the newsboby's stand, he tells the urchin that he is out of work and hasn't any place to go. With the same goodness of heart with which he gave the poor old man the pennies, the boy offers Frank lodging in his humble home and tells him he may remain there until he finds work and gets upon his feet again. Frank meets Ruth, the newsboy's sister, and as time passes, this friendship ripens into love. After a few days, Frank secures a job as a common workman. He is so interested in his work and the girl that he fails to see how he could ever return to his old ways and social position. One evening, Dick, the newsboy, returns home with a copy of the evening paper, in which there is printed a picture of Frank Willard and Grace Meridith, and a story about their engagement. Dick upbraids Frank, telling him that he has deceived Ruth. Frank confesses his identity and leaves.

Ruth overtakes Frank at the corner and together they go to the home of the society belle, where they discover she has eloped with Count Ver Saities. A note found on the library table, denouncing Frank and proclaiming her love for the Count, sets the adventurer free. Ruth loved him with all her heart, and Frank had learned to love her, so they decide to get married, making Dick and his mother very happy.

THE WINNER (Special—2 parts—April 17).—Dan Ryan and Fritz Noodle, two would-be politicians, succumb to the charming mannerisms of the Widow Guggenheimer. The widow is undecided which one she shall select for a husband, but finally tells them she will marry the one who wins the election—the office to be that of Chicken Coop Inspector. There is much surprise and humiliation on the parts of the candidates when neither is elected. The widow solves the problem. "I will marry the man who is the best wrestler; arrange for a bout and I shall be the prize for the winner." The match is fought and Ryan is the victor. He is about to claim the widow for his own, when the REAL husband, supposedly dead, returns and ousts him, a knockout finish to Ryan, who had nearly been killed in the wrestling match to win the widow. A sad fate for one who had worked so hard for a prize.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE STOLEN SLIPPER (Fourth story of Octavius—Amateur Detective—April 20).—Octavius' interest was aroused by an article in the newspaper to the effect that an unusual thief was operating in the vicinity of one of the elevated stations. The thief snatched the slippers from the feet of women ascending the stairs to the trains.

Standing at the foot of the elevated stairs with his eagle eye bent on passers-by, Octavius was lucky enough to observe the thief in the act of stealing a woman's slipper. Octavius gave chase. The thief who had stolen the slipper entirely for the buckle on it, dropped his booty after the chase, and escaped. Octavius got the slipper, looked at it bewilderingly and carried it home.

The next morning, he looked carefully through his newspaper and found a reward was offered for the return of the slipper. Octavius, with his usual chivalry, decided on a touch of romance. Buying a large box of candy, he buried the slipper beneath the sweets and started for the address given in the advertisement.

The slipper belonged to Miss Mary Burke. A moment after Octavius had been shown into her apartment, two detectives entered, and arrested Mary as an accomplice of the notorious Scrapper Burns, burglar. Octavius, considerably bewildered, returned home, took the slipper from the box of candy, and looked at it. Later, he used it as a hammer. He discovered the heel was loose, and removed it. A wad of paper was hidden in it on which was a list of "swag" and the address of Scrapper Burns.

Octavius went to the police station, and blandly informed the chief that he was prepared to deliver Scrapper Burns. After the arrest of the criminal, Octavius decided to use the reward for the reformation of the unfortunate Mary Burke. But Mary biffed him in the eye, and Octavius contributed the money to the Policemen's Benefit Association.

THE HUNTED ANIMAL (Second of "The Man Who Disappeared" series—April 2).—In the first story of the series, John Perriton assumed the blame of a murder to save the brother of the girl he loved. We left him crossing Long Island Sound in a boat.

He had but little headway. The police were on his trail. Before reaching the middle of the Sound, a detective put out from the opposite shore to intercept him. Perriton bent all efforts to escape. The detective fired and broke the wooden oarlock. Perriton pretended to be hit, fell overboard and swam beneath the surface, but McWade, the detective, was after him like a flash, and soon had him handcuffed.

When they landed, McWade forced Perriton to walk in front up a steep slope. Perriton purposely slipped, fell on the detective, and both rolled to the bottom. Perriton escaped into the woods. After hours of wandering, he came to a railroad track.

As Perriton watched, a man emerged from the bushes across the track, looked cautiously about, stuck a white flag in the gound, and disappeared. Shortly afterward a train passed. A young girl on the rear platform threw a bundle into the bushes near the flag. With desperate agility, Perriton seized the bundle and fled. Opening it, he discovered a suit of clothes and a note, which said the clothes were intended for an escaped convict. Full directions for the man's further guidance were clearly written out. Since the handcuffs prevented Perriton from putting on the clothes, he resolved on a desperate expedient. Hearing the approach of a train he laid the chain on the track, averted his face and waited. The train roared by, and the links were crushed. Perriton put on the clothes, and for lack of a better plan, followed out the directions of the note. A bribed farmer cut off the handcuffs and carried him in a trunk to a tenement house, where a Chinaman received him. And here we leave Perriton until the next story.

WHEN EAST MET WEST IN BOSTON (April 22).—When Henry Clark, foremost authority on Sanscrit, issued a statement on a disputed word-form in the Rig-Veda, etymologists trembled.

When Henry Clark, A. M., Ph. D., Litt. L., received word announcing that a friend of his father's on his deathbed had expressed a desire that Henry should marry his daughter, it shook all the Sanscrit roots out of Henry's head. He never thought of marriage. Still, anything to oblige an old friend of his father's. So Henry wrote an awkward letter to Ruth Maitland, the girl in question, telling her how glad he should be to meet her and how sorry he was that his profession would keep him from leaving Boston until the following summer. When Ruth received Henry's letter she giggled and after a little thought, decided to go to Boston and see what Henry was like.

In New York Ruth was very frigidly treated by an English girl whom she offered to help. On the train she heaped coals of fire on the other's head by paying her fare when the English girl discovered that her purse was missing. An intimacy rapidly developed between them. Ruth discovered the girl's name was Jessie Parker, and that she was bound for Boston. Later, to her amazement Ruth discovered that Jessie was going to visit the Clarks.

Henry knew of Jessie's coming and at the entreaties of his aunt had promised to meet her. With characteristic absent-mindedness, he forgot all about the train. When the girls arrived, there was no one to meet Jessie. So the two girls wandered about the crooked Boston streets for hours in hopes of finding the house. At last, after Ruth had knocked down one too helpful stranger, they arrived at Henry's house. And now comes the unexpected part of the story, for Henry fell madly in love with Jessie, while Ruth married Jack Ashton, Henry's cousin.

THE UNOPENED LETTER (Special—2 parts—April 24).—When Paul King married Kate Dwyer they were obliged to keep the wedding a secret. Paul was a law student, studying hard for the position awaiting him in his father's office. His father was a stern, irascible man. To have revealed the marriage to him would have ruined all chances of success. So Paul put off this acknowledgment until success should arrive. After his admission to the bar, he went to the city, leaving his wife with her sister in the little college town.

Jane, Kate's sister, was one of the "unce guid." She was a prim, severe woman with rigid ideas on all subjects. When she learned of her sister's marriage, she was horrified. As the months went by, and no word came from Paul, Jane took no pains in telling her sister that Paul would never acknowledge her.

When desired success came to Paul, he wrote a joyous letter to Kate, bidding her come. But it came too late. Jane holding their motherless daughter in her arms, received it just after the funeral, and directed it to be returned unopened. And when Paul arrived to see what the trouble was, Jane told him only that Kate was dead, saying nothing about the child.

Years later, Jane moves to the city and opened a boarding-house. The little girl, Louise, has now grown to a beautiful woman. To help meet the expenses, Louise worked as a stenographer in a factory office. Jack Osborne, son of the younger member of the firm of King & Osborne, met Louise and straightway fell in love with her.

Louise was injured at the factory, and Paul instituted proceedings against the management. King & Osborne were the attorneys for the defense. The case was full of exciting points until Jane Dwyer testifying gave her name and explained that she was the plaintiff's aunt. Paul King turned white, attempted to contine, but broke down. A satisfactory verdict was awarded to Louise.

After the trial Jane and Paul met. Jane's reproaches were softened when Paul told her what the unopened letter had contained and all Paul's anger was dissipated by his joy at the discovery of his daughter.

ON THE HEIGHTS (Sixth page in the active life of "Dolly of the Dailies"—April 25).—Dolly's friend, Rockwell Crosby, editor of the "Comet," disagrees with the management and resigned. Dolly was disappointed at the news, but that was as nothing compared to her rage at the attitude of his successor, who was a self-confessed "hustler" and intended to make everybody on the paper "sit up and take notice." The first assignment he gave Dolly was to wander about the streets after dark until she found a story. Dolly was furious. She had made a distinct place for herself on the staff, and was accustomed to being treated with consideration. There was nothing to do but obey, so Dolly started out.

To her amazement she ran across Ella Snyder, an old school friend, who was weeping bitterly. She had eloped with a young man named Oliver Allen. Oliver had brought her to a hotel, and had departed in search of a license. Having not come back for two hours Ella concluded that she had been deceived and decided to drown herself.

Dolly took the girl home, told her not to be silly, and went to get Allen. She found him at the hotel bewildered at the disappearance of his bride-to-be. Dolly, convinced that his intentions were honorable, took him back with her. They found Ella had disappeared again. She left a note, saying she had resolved to die. In order to repay Dolly, Ella said she was going to jump from the highest building in town, so Dolly could make a scoop of the news.

Dolly and Allen rushed to the Woolworth Building, and stopped Ella just in time. Then they repaired to the City Hall, where Ella and Allen were married.

Dolly returned to the office and told the editor she had a story, but didn't intend to write it. He was wildly indignant at first, until she had calmly explained she knew perfectly what she was doing.

THE RUBE'S DUCK (April 21).—Farmer Stephens buys a duck which he puts in an old carpet bag. Two painters, for a joke, paint a sign "Dynamite" and pin it on the bag. Stephens, while on his way home, stops to light his pipe, and when his back is turned a crook steals his bag. The crook is about to find out the contents of the bag when he notices the sign "Dynamite" and hears the duck quacking. He thinks it is an infernal machine and drops the bag and dashes off. The villagers are gathered and told of the supposed impending danger. After a lot of excitement the brave village storekeeper picks up a pitchfork and carefully carries the bag to the police station. Stephens rushes to the police station and finds the sheriff about to immerse the bag in a water trough. He rushes in, grabs his property and discloses the contents. The laugh is on the crowd.

OUTWITTING DAD (April 21).—Lena Gross's sweetheart, Bob Kemp, is thrown into a sand pile by her father for daring to propose to his daughter. Bound that he shall marry Lena, Bob messes up his big brother, Reggie, as a bad man of the West, then telephones his plans to Lena. Father is chased into a stable. The boys shoot blanks through the door until the father, believing his life is in danger, gives his consent to the marriage. Reggie is left on guard at the stable door while Bob dashes to the minister and marries Lena. Reggie exhausted falls to sleep. Father sneaks out of the stable, discovers how he has been fooled, jumps on the sleeping Reggie and gives him a sound thrashing, then starts off to look for Bob. The young couple return from the church. Father at first wants to kill Bob, but Lena's pleadings finally wins him over, and the two children receive his blessing.

THE KLONDIKE BUBBLE (Special—2 parts—April 22).—Hungerford Wolf, a mining promoter, is without funds, and can see ahead a postponement of the marriage between himself and Hattie Lamb, daughter of a staid old professor. The professor is comfortable in his position as Professor Literature in Columbia College, and provides his wife and daughter with all the comforts of a respectable home. But his wife and daughter are socially ambitious, and while Hattie is fond of Wolf in a way, she is somewhat suspicious of the precariousness of his business. This is the condition of affair when we find Wolf brooding in his office. His reveries are interrupted by the appearance of one Dawson, from the Klondike, who has a mining property of promise which he wishes promoted and the stock placed on the market. Anxious to take hold of anything in the way of promoting, Wolf assures Dawson that he can control the capital to successfully float his enterprise. But capitalists have several times been caught in wildcat affairs and refuse to listen to him.

Suddenly he happens to think of the social ambitions of the Lamb wife and daughter and believes that through them he can get his hooks on the Lamb nest egg. Accordingly he sets his project before them; they in turn place it up to Lamb, and he is finally induced to invest in a venture that, at least in the roseate verbiage of Wolf, will make him many times a millionaire. Lamb places himself entirely in the hands of Wolf, who at once begins to groom him to look like a real Wall Street blood. He is fashionably attired, taught to smoke cigars and is introduced to the allurements of cafes and theaters. The Klondike venture owing to the clever manipulation of Wolf, is at first a great success. The professor's women folk become social lionesses. There is never anything to interrupt the moral smoothness of things, until Wolf assures his pupil that he cannot be a real blood of finance until he has had a scandal, and this is brought about through an introduction to Mrs. Wall Street. But in the midst of the general elation the Klondike bubble is suddenly pricked. Through the machinations of a broker named Singe, whom Wolf has turned down in a business deal, the firm of Wolf and Lamb is so viciously attacked in a yellow newspaper that there is a sudden crash in Klondike shares. Wolf goes to the editor for the purpose of giving him a thrashing, when he is beaten to a pulp himself and devises a master stroke of diplomacy by inducing Lamb to fight a duel with the editor. The duel turns out to be a ludicrous farce for, in terror under fire, Lamb proves himself an arrant coward, and the only one hit is his second, Wolf, who is struck in the leg by a bullet. Matters then go to the dogs. Hattie breaks her engagement with Wolf, since he has brought about all the trouble, and the Lamb home is on the verge of being sold at auction, when news comes of a real strike in the mine and all ends happily, except that the professor decides to go back to his teaching.

THE DEATH WARRANT (Special—2 parts—April 23).—Some years ago Joseph Baxter and Franklin Cross were in business together, but a dispute arose over a deal that was put through by Baxter which separated the two men in business and made enemies of the once friends. Cross had a son George who was brought up from childhood with Baxter's daughter, Helen. They not only grew up as playmates, but also as sweethearts, and when the dispute arose between their fathers, who lived next door to each other, they still continued to meet each other at the hedge separating the two houses. It so happens one day that George, a little bolder than usual, enters the yard of his sweetheart's home, and is sitting on the terrace conversing with her when her father appears and runs him off of his grounds. When George arrives at his own home, his father upbraids him for being engaged to Helen. The old man is so persistent FEATURES that deliver the goods — draw the money and satisfy audiences. Features that have been approved by the severest board of censors in the world—the great American Public. Features without a disappointment—features that made an immediate success of the Box Office Attraction Film Rental Co., and caused the most exacting showmen to scramble for the right to book them in their neighborhoods. The fact that you want them is enough to secure this franchise. Your competitor cannot get them at any price until after you have run them—and not then if you object.

"Vengeance Bequeathed"

In Three Interest-Impelling Parts

An absorbing story wonderfully acted and graphically produced in vivid photography—the best you have seen. Beautiful interior scenes with a marvelous chase led by a girl to detract attention from her sister. Not an idle or dull moment. Audiences applaud this feature generously.

"The Secret of Adrianople"

Tense Three-Part War Drama

The average person's knowledge of war, before the days of the motion pictures, was very vague. In "The Secret of Adrianople" you have a war play of the higher type. You see a brave soldier of one of the Balkan States approach in an air ship. Your breath comes rapidly as he fulfills his mission only to be pursued and captured after his motor boat is blown up and his biplane is wrecked.

"Daughter of Eve"

Great Northern Three-Part Special

Misconceived circumstances result in complications that cause a series of dramatic situations. This could easily happen to a divorced woman who had married her second husband, particularly if her little daughter had been left in the custody of the first. Discriminating audiences have given this play their unqualified approval.

"The Criminal Path"

Another Ramo in Four Big Parts

The relentless sleuth knows the father's past, and reasons that the daughter must be an accomplice. His belief is based on an uncertain knowledge of the laws of heredity, and while his conclusions are absolutely wrong, he takes advantage of circumstances to convict the burglar's child of participation in a bold attempt to rob a bank. Big money getter.

"The Fangs of Hate"

Ramo Production in Three Parts

This is a sensational photo-play because the story is a good one and the thrills are mental rather than physical. Gypsie revenge is offset by Gypsie love, and the innocent is saved at the cost of a broken heart, a head-on collision between two trains and death. Exhibitors who have booked this feature say it is one of our very best.

"The Treasure of Buddha"

Three-Part Drama of Love and Venture

In England's conquest of India material for hundreds of dramas and tragedies was created. And drama and tragedy are set in backgrounds of gorgeous splendor. The luxurious foliage of a semi-tropical country, the brilliant but barbaric architecture of the buildings, the fabulous richness of the costumes, and the picturesque personalities of the natives, combine to produce wonderful scenes and action.

If you are among the few exhibitors who have not booked these features you will make no mistake in doing so at once. They have been presented to a variety of audiences first class as well as mixed—and every report is favorable. Descriptive heralds sent free upon request to any exhibitor in our territory.

in his insults to Helen that George becomes angry. The old man is about to strike George, when George seizes a war club from among the curios hanging on the walls, and is about to protect himself, when his father falls to the table from heart failure, striking his head and causing instant death.

Baxter, who has come over to settle the dispute once and for all, overhears George and his father quarreling. Looking through the library window he sees the elder Cross drop dead, but at the trial which takes place later when George is accused of his father's murder, Baxter simply says that he overheard the two men quarreling, that is all. George is found guilty and sentenced to be electrocuted in ninety days. Shortly before the execution is to take place Baxter suffers from a serious attack of sickness, which the doctors tell him will mean death in a week's time. His conscience begins to prick him over the testimony that he had given at George's trial. He therefore rushes Helen to the executioner to stop it, while he hurries to the governor and is successful in obtaining an appeal for reprieve. Two days later George is pardoned by the governor and goes with Helen to her father's home, where they find that Joseph Baxter has passed away peacefully and with a clear conscience.

WILL BLOOD TELL? (April 24).—Harry Dane, a popular young college man, meets at a fraternity dance, Rose Leclare, with whom he falls in love. Harry knows nothing of his family or parentage, he having been reared by a guardian, who will tell him nothing. Concerning Rose he has no knowledge beyond that, like himself, she is a resident of Philadelphia, and that she is visiting the college town with her father. The love affair progresses and Harry communicates to his guardian his intention of marrying. The guardian at once secretly interviews Mr. Leclare. He tells the father that Harry, though unaware of the fact, is the son of a famous thief, and that his ancestors for generations have been outlaws, and that while Harry, so far, has demonstrated none of the criminal traits of his father, he, the guardian, fears that in the end "blood will tell," and he deems it his duty to inform the father before he agrees to the marriage. Under the conditions of the guardianship, Harry cannot be informed of this presumed taint in his blood.

Leclare communicates this intelligence to Rose. The girl does not believe in hereditary traits, and proposes to prove that Harry is all that he seems to be. She tells the boy that she and her father are not the wealthy persons they seem to be, but successful crooks that the excitement of this life is too delightful to her to dream of giving it up, and that to prove his love, he must join her in a robbery which she has already planned to execute. Harry is horrified, but his love prevails over his scruples. They go to Philadelphia and the robbery is accomplished. The jewels are entrusted to Harry, Rose declaring that as she is suspected she dare not keep them. When alone Harry suffers agonies of conscience, and finds that, even to win Rose he cannot be a thief. This he writes to Rose, sending the note to her hotel, and enclosing a check for all the money he has in bank to cover her share of the stolen property. Early the next morning he takes the packet containing the stolen jewels and goes to the house they robbed and asks for the mistress of the house, determined to make restitution and face punishment. He is shown into the room from which the jewels were taken, and left alone. The servant returns, announces his mistress. To Harry's amazement, Rose enters, and Harry soon learns that this is her house, and that they are her jewels he holds in his hands. Both guardian and father are satisfied that Harry has proved that blood does not always tell, and the wedding is set for an early date.

LITTLE BREECHES (April 25).—Gabriel Hall is telling the village parson why it is that he believes in God and the angels, so ably poetized by the late John G. Hay in one of his earlier poems. Gabriel comes to town with a load of turnips, bringing his little boy, Gabe, with him. Going into a store to make a purchase he leaves little Gabe in charge of the horses. The horses run away with him over the snow-covered prairie. Hall goes in search of the boy and finds at first only the overturned wagon in a snow drift. Despairing of human aid he kneels in the snow in prayer and shortly thereafter finds the little boy in a sheepfold, where he is nestled among the sheep. This is the reason, why in bidding the parson goodnight, he emphasizes his belief in the efficacy of prayer with the verse:

"And I think that savin' a little child
And bringin' His to His own
Is a whole lot better business
Than singin' around the throne."

A DREAM OF THE CIRCUS (April 25).—Tommy has had a strenuous day. The big circus is in town and made a glorious parade, after which Tommy goes to his home playground—the nursery—and arranges his toys as a miniature circus. Tired out, he goes to bed and is quickly in dreamland. He sees the grand ring parade, with the prancing steeds and brave riders in silver and gold paraphernalia. The crazy clowns and bespangled riders and leapers. He sees strange men, some two feet high and others twelve feet high. Wonderful animals are in the menagerie and wonderful people in the side shows, as well as snakes that swallow animals twice their size, bones and all. Tommy is bewildered and, with a scream of excitement ,wakes up, turns over, sleeps again to see more of the circus, which will be told next week.

GEORGE KLEINE.

HER FALSE FRIEND (Cines—Special—2 parts—April 21).—Laura Greville, secretly in love with her cousin, Henry, is first heartbroken, then furious, when she learns of his marriage to pretty Edith Day. With all the cunning of a woman cast aside, she lays her plans of revenge. By chance she learns that Edith has a brother, Paul, whom she has never mentioned to her husband, and who has been serving a prison sentence after having been convicted on circumstantial evidence of a crime he never committed. By intercepting letters passed between the brother and sister, she succeeds in making Henry suspicious of his wife's fidelity. Hoping to cure her of what he believes to be a foolish infatuation, he charters a yacht and together with her and Laura sets out upon a cruise of the Mediterranean.

One day the crew suddenly discover that there is a fire in the hold of the vessel, and within a few moments the sturdy craft is a pillar of flame. The captain and sailors, panic-stricken, take to the lifeboats, and Greville, believing his wife sate, succeeds in escaping from the vessel with Laura. Sweeping the sea with his glass, Tom Reynard spies the blazing hulk and is horrified to see that there is a woman aboard. He hurries to the rescue in a powerful motor boat, arriving in time to save Edith's life, but the shock is too much for her and her reason gives way under the strain. Reynard, however, places her in the hands of an eminent specialist, and after a long siege, she recovers. In the meantime Greville, believing his wife to be dead, has married Laura. Terror stricken when they learn of her escape, Greville and the woman plan an abduction, which is frustrated by Reynard. Desperate, the husband rids Edith of his presence forever, leaving her free to accept the love of her handsome young preserver.

THE SECOND WIFE (April 21).—The common, but perplexing problem is, what should be the plan for a woman, who, marrying a widower, finds that her husband's love for his first wife is eclipsing his love for her? This is the uncomfortable situation in which Betty finds herself a short time after her marriage to Tom, a jeweler, whose particular jewel is his daughter, Gladys. The young wife grows very fond of the child, and yet, at first, she meets antagonism in this direction, and this begins the primary trial with the husband, who sides with his little daughter. It was this incident that revealed to her that Tom idolized the memory of his first wife still as a living power. Fate seemed to be piling up humiliations for Betty, yet she turned the tide by winning the love of the child and through this means the greater love of her husband.

A valuable package has been entrusted to Betty by her husband, but in the absorbing preparations for Gladys' appearance in a masquerade as a fairy, this package becomes mixed with discarded finery. When its loss is discovered, Tom bitterly reproaches Betty for her carelessness; but Gladys, arriving from the party and finding Betty in tears, rallies instantly to her support. Through Gladys, however, the chain of events that carry the package to the furnace room to be burned, is traced, and Betty, at the cost of severe burns to herself, rescues the packet. When Tom learns the true circumstances, he is deeply repenant, and at the end finds that Betty is truly worthy of all of his love and respect.

THE LAST MAN'S CLUB (April 22).—A dozen survivors of Troop H of the "Bloody Fifth," after one of the battles of the Civil War, gather at a tavern to celebrate their escape. A bottle of select wine is purchased, and the signature of every man present is written on the label. It is then stored away to be given to the last survivor, and from it he is to drink to the memory of the departed ones ere he joins the great majority. Thus was formed "The Last Man's Club."

Fifty years later, Corporal Wheeler, who has been spared life, but who has come to poverty in a tenement of a great city, brings to light the precious bottle that he has managed to save through all adversities, just as he has returned from the funeral of the only other survivor of the club. Across the hall from his apartments lives an eccentric old inventor, Verne, almost as poverty-stricken as the Grand Army man. One day he discovers the value that the soldier sets by the precious bottle when he is present, summoned by a physician to attend the old soldier in one of his heart attacks. He hears the doctor, who is a curio collector, make a large cash offer for the bottle, which Wheeler indignantly refuses. Later, Verne, observing the failure of his invention imminent, unless he raises money, steals the bottle from Wheeler, intending to sell it to the doctor. His daughter, Margie, is terribly distressed over the insane move of her father, secures the bottle and returns it to the poor old soldier, with tearful apologies, explaining in palliation that her father is crazy over his invention. The old soldier is so touched that he forces the girl to keep the bottle. Her father disposes of it to the physician and completes his invention, which sells for a large sum. He then buys the bottle back, and gives it to the old corporal with a goodly pile of gold pieces, to comfort his declining years. But his time comes sooner than he thought. He realizes that his end is near, and with his war-scarred saber, he strikes the head from the cobwebbed bottle and its faded signatures, catches the wine in a goblet, and drains it to the memory of his comrades who have passed from roll-call.

IN SPITE OF THE EVIDENCE (April 23).—The simple matter of the strange strength in "the folded arm," shows the power of a patient people to work silently but effectively against wrong doing in high places. A governor who idolizes his daughter, seemingly has few other virtues. She, however, is the very apple of his eye, and is betrothed to the lieutenant-governor. It comes about that the governor will veto a bill to prohibit Child Labor, which greatly disturbs his daughter. She pleads with him tearfully and prayerfully. "Dissolves" show happy children at school, and then in contrast, the poor, ragged, wretched, exhausted factory children, dragging their way to and from work. The governor is deeply moved and intimates he will sign the bill. Then he is visited by the political boss, who warns him: "Veto that bill, or I'll reveal you to your daughter as a taker of bribes."

The last move is a telling one. The malignant boss triumphs over the lovely daughter. The governor vetoes the bill. The newspapers denounce him as a traitor, and the people demand his resignation. The daughter then asks her fiance: "If my father resigns, you will succeed him. Will you sign the bill?" He declares that he will. She then makes it a point to secure her father's resignation. He receives a photograph, showing the picture of a folded arm with a snake bracelet entwining it, with the warning: "Resign tonight, or suffer this." He tears the picture up in fury, and the next morning he faces the force of the menace. Every man he meets folds his arms. Even when he starts to embrace his daughter, she folds her arms, and he sees the snake bracelet on her arm. Appalled, he cries: "Then you, my own daughter, are the leader of this movement!" She admits it. Crushed with grief and shame, he starts to write his resignation, and completes the act just as the mob assembles in front of the mansion, calling for such action. She has found the way! Her husband-to-be will sign the bill! She wraps her arms about her broken father in angelic devotion.

MIKE THE AVENGER (April 24).—Mike suddenly felt that he was the strongest man ever. Previous to this mental revelation, he had been a joke to all who knew him. Everybody kicked him around. He was mauled, misused and abused, made miserable every hour of the day. Accidentally he laid hands upon a power cable that was carrying millions of volts of electricity. Mike was a magnetic man. He recovered miraculously and it was then he discovered that he was 90,000,000 horsepower strong. Then the thought of revenge occurred. He tried himself out. He bent a crowbar across his mighty chest, and then gave it a contemptuous fling, which sent it flying over earth until it disappeared beyond the distant mountain. From that moment until the end of his shadowy career of strength, Mike's cognomen was "Devastation," in large black-faced letters. He went thumping among his ancient enemies, flinging them to the four winds. Some of them fled and hid in the section house. He pulled it down and scattered the frightened huskies. Proceeding on his tempestuous way, he rescued a child from an onrushing automobile, and then kicked the "chug chug" back up the hill, tieing the chauffeur in a double bow-knot.

Everything seemed to be giving way before him. But his Titanic power was his undoing. He was chased by a man with a shotgun, and seemed to think that would tickle; so he dashed through a brick wall. Passing through it, he went down a terrible incline and struck the earth below with such force that he went into the ground lower and lower until he tapped the internal waters and infernal fires. At the close of this screaming burlesque, Mike is observed still descending on his journey, unending.

THE CHERRY PICKERS (Special—2 parts—April 13).—Col. Guest is entertaining the officers of his regiment, and is assisted by his lovely daughter, Nourmalle. Among the uniformed guests is Lieut. John Nazare, a Eurasian, an aide to the colonel, who is conspicuous through his attentions to the young lady—the toast of the night. Another prominent personage is Major Brough, an elderly man of fine figure and military bearing, but a coarse and unscrupulous character. He is infatuated with the fair Nourmalle; but she instinctively turns the cold shoulder to the amorous major, while she is correspondingly friendly toward the young lieutenant. This establishes instant hatred on the part of the major for his subordinate on the staff.

The regiment goes to India and is ordered to take the field against the warring Afghans. Before departure for the interior, a reception is given at the post, which is attended by the Viceroy and other notables. During the course of the voyage Col. Guest had yielded to an ancient weakness—cards; and now finds himself heavily indebted to his more skillful and unscrupulous companion in play, Major Brough. He hardly knows which way to turn in order to raise the money to meet the so-called "obligation of honor," and finally agrees to the major's proposition that he give him Nourmalle's hand in marriage, it being understood that this will cancel all debts. Of course, the young lady does not understand the arrangement and continues to treat the major with distinct disdain. As the function is at its height, a sentry rushes in with the report that two Afghan spies, Ayoob and Leukman, have been captured, prowling about within the fort, and that a large force of Afghans are in the immediate neighborhood, preparing for an attack. Major Brough is elected to command by the colonel, in turn to be supported by Lieut. Nazare, and a picked detachment of Hussars to drive off the scouting parties that are menacing the fort, while the rest of the company keep up the festivities in happy ignorance of imminent danger. In the skirmish that follows, Lieut. Nazare, at the risk of his life in a hand-to-hand conflict with one of the natives, saves his commander, Brough. The latter, however, in his bitterness and humiliation only hates his rival in love all the more. By the same daring deed Nazare acquires unknown to himself, the bitter hatred of Ayoob, the spy, who swears that he will discover and kill the man who ended the life of his brother.

A little while later, Major Brough, who nurses his enmity secretly, allows it to break out openly and purposely insults Nazare, who, enraged beyond control, strikes his superior officer. This is a serious military offense, and Brough at once orders him incarcerated in the prison in which Ayoob is a sojourner. The cunning Brough, having learned of the Afghan's vow to kill the soldier who slew his brother, manages to impress upon Ayoob that Nazare is the man. Brough carries his sense of duty to an extraordinary degree, by having Nazare chained in the tower of the prison above a gun port. The chief furnishing of this tower is a revolving cannon. With diabolical ingenuity, he brings Ayoob in the presence of the other prisoner, to the tower, explains the working of the gun, and then leaves him to settle his affair with Nazare. Ayoob, with the true joy of an Oriental, is almost crazed over the opportunity of such fine revenge, and goes about it with fiendish deliberation.

Brough, having seemingly disposed of his enemies, rushes off to Nourmalle, who has steadily repulsed him, and tells her of the tragedy that will soon end the life of her lover, and bring such havoc, that no blame can be laid to him. The boaster, however, has not reckoned upon the strength and quickness of the weak woman, who writhes under the knowledge of imminent ruin. She snatches the heavy prison keys from the belt of the phlegmatic major, gives him a blow on the brow that knocks him senseless to the floor and rushes to the tower. She liberates Nazare from his shackles just a few seconds before the cannon is discharged by the fanatical Ayoob. His faulty aim instead of going through the port, strikes the wall and brings down the masonry about him, causing his own death, while the girl and her lover escape to her father. Explanations follow and lead to the cashiering of the villainous major, who is disgraced at home as well as in India, leaving the lovers happy, presumably ever after.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN (No. 8)—THE CRUEL CROWN (April 16—Special—2 parts).—Pandemonium follows the escape of the leopards, placed to guard the treasure-room in Umballah's palace. Royal personages and their attendants flee from the spotted terrors, and Kathlyn takes advantage of this to get away from the throne-room, where she was surrounded by enemies. She flees into the Garden of Brides and takes refuge in a covered bullock cart close to the palace walls. In the scene which follows, both the occupiers of the covered cart and gazes affrighted at the prowling leopards in the palace yard. As they rush by, she deserts the cart, and runs through the garden. Still, the walls seem to bar her escape. A heavy, clinging vine is not to be despised and immediately uses this means to scale the barrier. Her father and Hamabal, who have been reinforced by Bruce and Pundita, have their camels only a short distance away and her appearance is hailed joyously. She is assisted down the wall by a ladder; then the party mount their camels and start through the city of Allaha.

As they pass through the outer gate, they are recognized by Umballah's Captain of Guard, who hurriedly rushes to the palace and notifies Umballah, who is holding a session with the Council of Three,

THE LITTLEST REBEL

"The Littlest Rebel," by Edward Peple, scored one of the greatest successes ever known to the legitimate theatre, running a whole season in New York and forty weeks in Chicago.

No play from the speaking stage ever lent itself more perfectly to motion picture reproduction. No one can resist the throbs and tears and laughs and thrilling exultation of its truthful and pathetic story. It appeals with equal force to every class of picture goers—cultured or ignorant—rich or poor—young or old—upon the face of the earth.

Back of these natural advantages stands a definite idea of production which will make "The Littlest Rebel" a five-reel photo play masterpiece of surpassing excellence.

THE PRINCIPAL PARTS ARE PLAYED BY FAMOUS MOTION PICTURE PLAYERS. THERE IS NO DOUBT ABOUT THEIR ABILITY TO BRING OUT ALL THE DRAMATIC VALUES AND GIVE SATISFACTION IN THEIR WORK.

E. K. LINCOLN, star of the Vitagraph Company, one of the finest and most popular picture actors in the world, heads an organization which includes two Universal stars, an Edison lead, a Mutual director and a crack Edison camera man. The scenes in the picture are those of the picturesque and sunny Southland described by the author. Every detail of production has been studied out with care. The original flags of battle are unfurled to the breeze once more—the genuine declaration of war is flashed upon the screen. Veteran officers of the Confederate and Federal Armies assist in directing the sensational battle scenes.

Whole troops of United States Army Regulars, a thousand uniformed men with hundreds of horses, complete cavalry, infantry and artillery equipments, arms and ammunition, are employed to furnish action, color and atmosphere to the most sublime and beautiful war story ever written.

of his discovery and their departure. Umballah decides to give chase, as he is particularly anxious to recapture Col. Hare, who has been made king, merely to serve as the creature of his caprice. Then begins an exciting chase over plains, and through woodlands with thrilling incidents. At a native village, the party come upon a festival in which the dancers are masked with animal heads. Learning of the close pursuit of Umballah, they persuade the dancers to allow them in their places, and although Umballah and his followers come upon the scenes and see the dancers, they do not penetrate the disguise and recognize them, and so disgusted, they finally reluctantly return to Allaha.

Kathlyn and her party, having secured fresh mounts, start on their way to cross the mountains and eventually stop and camp for the night. During the hours of darkness, treacherous natives steal their horses, greatly inconveniencing the travelers. Different members of the party start out in the morning to hunt their property, and Kathlyn is trailed through the broken country by a pair of hungry tigers. Her situation is perilous, indeed, when a sheep-herder observes her and, throwing up a rope, Kathlyn fastens it to a rock, and then slides down the face of the cliff, leaving the maddened, astonished brutes snarling at the summit.

Hardly has she escaped this danger, when she hears the howling of a pack of wolves, and rushes breathlessly along until she sees the mountain resthouse where the faithful Pundita is resting. The wolves make for the cabin, but the women cunningly see an inner room in the house, and by concealing themselves in the cupboard, allow the wolves to rush into it, then, shoving the door shut—trap the savage howling beasts. By this time, Col. Hare and Bruce have arrived upon the scene—Kathlyn shows the hunter how she has imprisoned the wolves, and he leisurely picks off the leaders with his rifle. About this time a caravan comes that way, which they join, and eventually arrive safely at a seaport town. Here they learn, to their sorrow, from a California cablegram, that Kathlyn's sister, Winnie, had died several weeks before for India, and is now in the city of Allaha. Although their own safety was secure, they decided at once to return to Allaha, as they are familiar with the treacherous disposition of Umballah, and know he will visit all his wrath upon the innocent girl.

This is about as they expected, for the real ruler of Allaha, having discovered Winnie and recognizing her as the girl he saw in California, makes her a prisoner, and, previous to placing the Crown of Allaha upon her head, has her sequestered in the harem. Kathlyn and her party secure disguises before entering the city, and come upon the scene on the very day of the coronation. They manage to secure admittance to the throne-room, and Kathlyn secretly gets a message to her sister, assuring her of the plans made for her rescue. The openly cruel treatment of Umballah to Winnie causes Kathlyn to throw aside her disguise, and boldly reveal her own identity. (To be continued).

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN (No. 9)—THE SPELLBOUND MULTITUDE (April 20—Special—2 parts).—Kathlyn's sister, Winnie, has been cowed and terrorized; is feebly crowned Queen of Allaha, to serve the sinister purpose of the scheming Umballah. By forced marches, Kathlyn, her father and party, reach the city and secure admission to the Coronation ceremony, disguised as animal trainers; but they are powerless to do anything other than observe and plan such action for the immediate future as fertility can suggest. After the ceremonies are over, the ruffian party returns to Col. Hare's headquarters and immediately start plans in train for the rescue of Winnie—Kathlyn plans to gain entrance to the royal harem, where Winnie is known to be held as a prisoner. This she expects to do by having Winnie feign sickness and insist upon sending for a female physician. Kathlyn secures the dress of a practitioner, is admitted to the harem, and eventually starts to smuggle her sister out and escape through the garden. This seems practical until the suspicious Umballah finds that the physician is none other than Kathlyn herself. He orders her to be immediately seized and confined as a prisoner in another room of the harem and held until the conclusion of the festival of the Juggernaut.

The big feature of this festival is an enormous car containing the effigy of the dreadful idol, that is rolled along, crushing devotees in its path as willing human sacrifices. This gigantic car is trundled along on its way toward the Sacred River, but night coming on, the High Priest and his toiling sacristans are forced to leave the big fabric at the top of a hill. Umballah learns of this and conceives a fiendish plan for driving poor Kathlyn into the earth and everlastingly ending her power to thwart him. He secretly has the heroine taken out of her harem prison, and then has her staked down in the path of the car. Happily the keen-eared Pundita has overheard the plot, and she at once informs Col. Hare and Bruce. They rush to the rescue cautiously, but without delay. The staking party have no sooner completed the work, and rush away in the darkness to start the car on its horrible journey, than Bruce and Col. Hare arrive and pull out the stakes, just as the great car comes crashing down the incline, crushing everything in its path.

Umballah, on investigation, finds that his plan failed, and fearing the rifles of Col. Hare's party, slinks back to the palace purple with rage. His most carefully laid plots appear to go awry, and with death in his clasp, he seems destined to be continuously routed of revenge. However, he has Winnie, and that is currently savage satisfaction to him.

Bruce and Col. Hare have been busy, and Kathlyn's ready wit in the interim has not been idle, devising another way for the rescue of the young American from a fate worse than death. Ramabai assumes one of his cleverest disguises, and goes to the palace as an agent for a wild animal show, requesting permission for them to give a performance in the arena. Umballah suspicions something and is rather reluctant to give consent; but, Winnie is queen, and she insists that the entertainment be given, and the Council of Three, singularly enough, agree with her. Bruce, anticipating this, has secretly ordered his men to bore a tunnel from a point under the stage, to another outside the palace walls.

The next scene shows the great Arena in gala decoration, crowded with royalty and the people of Allaha. It is the greatest affair since the Coronation and attracts a vast throng. Lions, tigers and leopards are shown in the great domed cage and then are allowed to run freely through the big arena, and are finally put through their paces by trainers, giving a remarkable exhibition. Then Kathlyn appears garbed as a trainer. A woman trainer is something new to that locality, and when Kathlyn appears in this guise, she is wildly applauded by the people. She agrees to face the savage carnivora and make them perform, provided that the Queen of the day be allowed to stand by her. This personage, of course, is her sister, Winnie, and she imperiously demands the right of a Queen to do as she pleases. She, accordingly, descends from the royal box by a rope ladder into the arena. Umballah is furious, as usual; but concludes to end it all by turning all the hungry lions loose in the arena. Kathlyn gives the show with the tigers and leopards as her sister stands by the cage. Just then the hungry lions come—a roaring, rampant herd—leaping after them. They rush toward Kathlyn and her sister, but the latter hurriedly rush into the performer's cage and spring the trap, descending to the tunnel as if by magic. The trapdoor closes quickly, so the angered brutes leap about snarling and roaring—once again balked of their human prey. (To be continued).

KALEM.

THE SECRET FORMULA (Special—2 parts—April 20).—To test Fred's mettle, William takes the boy, who is the son of a former business associate, into his employ as chauffeur. Before long, Alice, the manufacturer's daughter and Fred are deeply in love. Mrs. Williams angrily orders Fred to cease paying attentions to Alice. The woman favors the suit of Decatur, a young society man. Despite the mother's attitude, Fred and Alice are secretly married. Decatur later proposes to Alice, but the girl turns a deaf ear to his plea. The young society man learns that Williams has discovered a secret formula for manufacturing fibre. Awaiting his opportunity, Decatur steals the formula. Suspicion points to Fred as the thief. Decatur accuses the boy and is promptly knocked down. Fred reads doubt in Alice's eyes. In anger, he bitterly upbraids her. Williams is staunch in his belief that Fred is innocent.

Suspecting Decatur of having stolen the secret formula, Fred follows the man home. Disguised as a window cleaner, he enters Decatur's room. In the desk, he finds the precious secret and a copy which the thief has made. Fred returns the documents to Williams. They plan to entrap the thief. Decatur comes to the house in response to Williams' request. He calmly announces he stole the formula and offers to return it upon the condition that Alice be compelled to marry him. Decatur holds an envelope which he believes contains the document. Williams seizes it. Tearing the envelope open, he shows Decatur that it only contains a blank piece of paper. The manufacturer then displays the formula and the copy recovered by Fred. Nonplussed, the villain tries to escape, bu tfinds a policeman waiting to place him under arrest. Begging forgiveness because of her suspicions, Alice comes into Fred's arms.

GREY EAGLE'S LAST STAND (Special—2 parts—April 22).—Major Wells, commandant at Fort Johnston, sends his son, Tom, a private in his command, to Colonel Grey, in command of the troops stationed in the territory, requesting leave of absence. Believing this will be granted, Major Wells departs from the post.

Wanoka, an Indian maid, refuses to marry Chief Grey Eagle and is driven from the tribe. Her lover, Strong Heart, is helpless to aid her. Shortly afterward, Wanoka falls from a cliff and is injured. Tom comes upon Wanoka. He helps her to the cabin of a settler.

Tom reaches Colonel Grey's post and presents his father's request. Because of the ugly attitude of Grey Eagle and his tribe, Colonel Grey declines to grant Major Wells a leave of absence.

On his way back, Tom discovers that the Indians have gone on the warpath. He warns the settlers. Wanoka aids the people who have befriended her, in their dash for Fort Johnston. The whites arrive at the post in the nick of time. In the confusion, the troopers neglect to close the gates of the stockade and are compelled to take refuge in one of the buildings.

Wanoka sees Tom taken prisoner. The soldier is bound to one of the wheels of a wagon captured by the Indians. Wanoka steals from the fort. Attracting the attention of Strong Heart, she tells him of her debt of gratitude to Tom and secures her lover's aid in a plan to free the soldier.

The two trap Grey Eagle. Cutting Tom's bonds, Wanoka and Strong Heart tell him of their plan. The boy exchanges clothes with the chief. Clad in Grey Eagle's raiment, Tom dashes for help.

The soldier meets his father, who is returning. At the same time, Colonel Grey, attracted by the firing, comes up with his men. The soldiers surround the redskins. Caught between two fires, the Indians battle furiously. Overwhelmed by superior numbers, Grey Eagle and his men are wiped out.

A SALT MACKEREL MINE (April 24).—Old Judge Neville loses his heart to the fair Mary, but she will have none of him. Instead, she promises Handsome Luke, the owner of a salt mackerel mine, to be his'n. Does Neville give up in despair? He does not. Gritting his teeth, he vows that Mary shall be his wife. First, however, he determines to show Handsome Luke that he's a bad man to fool with. Yes, sir-e-e-e!

The villain hires Luke M'Glook and Bud Wefer, expert claim-jumpers, to steal his rival's salt mackerel mine. The plot succeeds only too well. The rascals steal Handsome Luke's mine and chase him off by threatening to fill him plum-full of buckshot. But Luke despairs not. He has some friends, he has. And so, reinforced by said friends, Luke descends upon Luke M'Glook and Bud Wefer. The villains take refuge in the mine shack. The heroes and the villains shoot at each other just as though ammunition cost them nothing. A bullet breaks a lamp in the shack, starting a fire.

Just to prove his courage and to show that his heart is in the right place, Handsome Luke dashes into the burning building and rescues both the claim-jumpers. Filled with gratitude, the men confess. The judge, foiled, then has Luke arrested for mining salt mackerel out of season. Fearful lest her heart's desire be sent to prison where he would lose his handsome shock of hair, Mary consents to be Judge Neville's wife, upon condition that he orders Luke freed.

Retribution overtakes the villainous old gent however. Handsome Luke's friends come to the rescue once more. Capturing Judge Neville, they take him to a gooseberry bush and make preparations to help him shuffle off this mortal coil. Just at this time, Captain Gettum and his Horse Marines heave into sight. The brave officer has a warrant out for Judge Neville's arrest. He rescues the man from the mob's wrath and takes him away to the calaboose. Handsome Luke, his rival out of the way, hastens to Mary's home and makes her his'n.

THE NURSE AND THE COUNTERFEITER (April 25).—Betty Gordon, a nurse at the City Hospital, and Dr. Andrews, the resident physician, are sweethearts. Through an item in one of the newspapers, the two discover that Haggard, one of their patients, is a notorious counterfeiter. A reward is offered for the man's capture. Keefe, one of Haggard's confederates, overhears Betty and Andrews planning the criminal's capture. The man enters Haggard's room and gives the alarm. The two escape by leaping out of the window, and dashing away in Keefe's auto. Betty, Andrews and a policeman enter the room in time to see the criminals disappearing down the road. A letter dropped by the fleeing counterfeiters betrays their destination. Ordering the policeman to summon help, Betty and Andrews take up the pursuit in the doctor's machine. The lovers succeed in finding the counterfeiters' rendezvous, but their attempt to enter the house is discovered and they are captured.

Betty is taken into the room used as a laboratory by Haggard, while Andrews is thrown, bound and gagged, on the kitchen floor. By a clever ruse, Betty drugs Haggard. Taking his pistol and donning his duster, the girl enters the room where Keefe and a henchman are standing guard over her sweetheart. The criminals are taken aback when Betty confronts them with an automatic pistol. Keefe, however, distracts the girl's attention. A moment later, both counterfeiters leap upon Betty and disarm her. The men are about to do away with the lovers when the police arrive. Breaking down the door, the officers engage in a hot battle with the criminals, and succeed in placing them under arrest.

The man he elects to rob is Paul Worcester, a member of Whiffles' club, and at the time the would-be Raffles visits Worcester's apartment, Mabel Vincent, Worcester's sweetheart is about to call on him. Mabel's father objects so strenuously to Paul that Mabel goes heavily veiled, lest she be recognized and her father informed.

Worcester is absent from his apartment when Whiffles gains admission with the assistance of a couple of policemen who believe that Whiffles is locked out. Whiffles is just in time to receive Mabel. She is surprised by not meeting Paul, but the glib Whiffles explains that he is Paul's pal and Mabel is satisfied. A moment or so later Paul enters. Whiffles spirits away the nervous girl and donning her hat and vail and cloak, receives Paul with open arms. In the next room Mabel sneezes. Paul rushes to investigate. Whiffles seeks safety in flight. He selects a window as an exit and drops into the arms of two passing policemen. At last reports Whiffles was still trying to explain.

But Jack finally dumps the Colonel on the street and with his heels sends him through a window and into a bed already occupied. The occupant, a rebel, is peeved at the intrusion and in the battle which follows Heeza emerges triumphant. Not only that, but he steals an aeroplane and with its anchor hooks Huerta and after depositing him on Mars delivers the Mexican's sword to President Wilson and receives the medal of the Legion of Watchful Waiting.

SIAMESE CUSTOMS (Indo-China)—(April 22).—A queer little Kingdom is Siam and queerer still are its customs which are shown in this short film which has a positive educational value.

THE TANGO CRAZE (Special—2 parts—April 23).—The physical exertions with the late hours he spends in following the pace lead to the utter exhaustion of a disciple of the tango till the time comes, one morning after an all night dance, when he falls asleep at his work. His slumber is marked by pleasant dreams through which he discovers and captures the tango microbes. In his dreams he takes his new discovery before a society devoted to his favorite dance. On the way the microbe has developed to such a point that upon opening his bag he brings to light lilliputians, expert in terpsichorean art, who hold the spectators spellbound by their exhibitions on a table. From there the enthusiasts repair to a dance hall to revel in the pleasures of the tango in its several forms. During the evening a professional team enraptures the guests by their proficiency in its movements. Instantly all are bent on acquiring the grace and ease of their instructors. Some become quite expert and others less advanced, some are conservative while others disregard all restraint and give themselves heart and soul to the task.

One man becomes a slave to the dance and is the last one to leave the hall. On his way home he dances on the street with all whom he meets. Even animals, objects of adornment, and conveyances are subject to his search for a tango partner.

At the dance a lady leaves her husband because of her infatuation for one of the members of the professional team. The lady of this team in turn forms a quick attachment for the deserted man. There follows at once for both parties private lessons in the mysteries of the dance and when the dance breaks up for the night the lessons are continued in their individual homes. The dance crazed man who has finally landed in an automobile is put down before a house which he enters. It happens to be the home of the girl who was accompanied thence by the professional dancer who had since left. An opportunity for a tango with such a charming partner is not to be lost and they dance till the lady falls from exhaustion, at which time her husband returns and throws the intruder into the street. But the shock of striking the pavement is too much and the dreamer awakes.

BREAKING EVEN (Special—2 parts—April 25).—Rita Sanderson, a stage star, finding that her manager, James Clement, is making more money than she is, decides that it would be well if she could marry him and accordingly lays her plans with that end in mind. Harry Williams, Rita's leading man, is in love with her and he believes he can win her affection by showing to advantage when compared with Clement, who is a notorious tight wad.

Rita expresses her admiration for an expensive pearl necklace and intimates that it would be a very welcome gift. The next day Harry sees Clement emerging from a cheap jewelry shop. Imagine his surprise when later that day Rita exhibits a necklace, the gift of Clement. She believes it to be the magnificent one she admired, but Harry proves it a cheap substitute. He presents Rita with a necklace of real pearls, asking her to give him in exchange the cheap necklace given her by Clement. Harry, in order to purchase the necklace he has given Rita, has been forced to borrow money from a loan shark.

Harry is soon to be up against a run of circumstances he never could suspect. The first blow comes when Rita marries Clement. After the wedding, a friend who is a judge of gems informs Rita in the presence of her husband and Harry that the necklace she wears is worth about $15,000. Instantly Harry regrets that he made so expensive a gift to a lady who so little appreciated him. The next day the loan shark demands of Harry the money he has borrowed to pay for the necklace. Harry is dead broke.

The only solution he can evolve is to ask Rita to return the necklace. Yet he hates to be a piker. Still he must have the money, and hating himself he journeys to Rita's residence. He finds his erstwhile sweetheart in great trouble for her husband is suspicious of the manner in which the necklace was secured. Harry offers to swap the necklaces again. Rita agrees, and luckily, for the next day hubby demands the necklace. Rita gives him the one he gave her originally. Hubby has it appraised and finds it worth even less than he paid for it. The last seen of Harry he was leaving the office of the loan shark with a smile overspreading his features.

THE SLIPPERY SPY (March 29).—Little Willy, a handsome but mischievous small boy, is caught by his big sister taking her cigar coupons which have been given her by her sweetheart. Taunting her with this, Willy is spanked by his sister, and for his theft of the coupons is locked in a dark room. As she is leaving, he threatens to be a soldier when he grows up and act as a spy and get shot, saying then she will be sorry.

Falling asleep this comes true, and as a Union spy, he is commanded to steal important papers from the Confederates. Watching his chance he takes two suspicious looking envelopes from the general's desk, and to recover them, the general calls in a female detective. She comes, and after carefully measuring Willy's footprints with a ruler, she strikes a trail. Meanwhile Willy has been arrested, and is in the guardhouse. Managing to get away by feigning a nosebleed, she looks for the papers. While Willy is getting the key from the door to place down her back, she finds the documents in his hat band. He slides the cold key down, and at this moment the guard returns demanding admittance, but the door is locked. After many kickings and bangings, he is about to give up when Willy gets an idea. Hanging up a blanket he hides the little detective lady, and after much struggling behind, she emerges triumphantly with the key, and the guard is let in. As she is leaving the jail she looks at the papers. To her chagrin she finds they are cigar coupons, a hobby of the general's. At this point Willy awakens and his sister, relenting, he is again free to start trouble.

GRANDFATHER'S ROMANCE (April 12).—Mr. and Mrs. Brown leave for a reception and Willie is tucked in bed by his nurse, who tiptoes softly out, after extinguishing the lights. The little fellow, who has everything riches can buy, craves for human love and companionship, and after the nurse has gone he climbs from bed and sprawls himself in a rocker before the open grate, and proceeds to read his favorite book—meanwhile munching away at an apple. He is engaged thus when the bells ring, and tiptoeing downstairs, he opens the door to admit a poorly clad and shivering little girl, who is begging. Bringing her to his room the little fellow gets her some cake and milk, and then cuddles up by the chair in the fireplace, and proceeds to show her a picture which hangs on the wall, which is of his grandfather. He then tells her the story of the picture.

He tells her that when his grandfather was a young man, back in the Colonial days, he was ordered by his general to go to Arrowhead Inn and steal the plans of the redcoats, who are there. His sweetheart, who is waiting on the officers, overhears them talking, and after letting him in to the cellar, repeats the conversation. While they are talking he slips, and the officers, hearing a noise, rush down and capture him. They search the young soldier and tie him to a post, after which they return upstairs. Meanwhile his sweetheart returns, and after telling him her plans, dons his uniform and rides to the fort to tell them of the Britishers' plans. Arriving at the fort, she is held up by the sentry, but she refuses to tell her identity and is willing to be sentenced by them as a spy. At this moment her sweetheart, who has escaped, rides up and tells them the story of his being captured, and who the girl is. They are hailed as hero and heroine, and after the plans have been communicated to the general, they are given a wonderful dinner. At this point, the little fellow looks at the poor little girl and finds she has fallen asleep. He is just waking her when his parents come home from the reception, and he tells them about his little visitor. He asks them to please place her in his bed, and while he curls up in a big chair, the little girl goes peacefully off to sleep on the softest bed she has ever known.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE MOSQUE (2 parts—April 22).—Mohammed, an unscrupulous Arab, loves Fatma, a dark-eyed beauty. However, Fatma's father refuses to accept Mohammed because he has no wealth. Enraged by this refusal and the girl's evident dislike for him, Mohammed later attempts to overcome Fatma by brute force. Lieutenant Berard, a young European officer, comes to her rescue and thus incurs the Arab's hatred and the maiden's gratitude. Mohammed joins a band of wandering brigands and holds up a mail-coach. While accomplishing this, there is a terrible battle, in which many of the travelers are shot. The driver escapes and makes his way to the village and informs the officials.

Mohammed meanwhile interviews Fatma's father. That worthy, on being afforded a glimpse of Mohammed's suddenly acquired wealth, no longer hesitates to accept him as a son-in-law. Fatma is told to prepare to marry him. Though overwhelmed with dismay and secretly fearing the unscrupulous Arab, the girl with the fatalism of her people, believes it to be inevitable and prepares to obey her father. The wedding festivities take place amid the palms. The bride, gorgeously appareled, is seated upon a camel and escorted to her husband's house. But in the meantime, the driver, having met his assailant and marked his place of abode, informs the officials of his discovery. Mohammed is shadowed and as he is about to rejoin his bride, he is arrested and thrown into prison.

Later he makes his escape and seeks his companion. This is discovered and the young lieutenant and some other officers follow in pursuit. A long and exciting chase follows. The Arab's horse goes swiftly and for a time fortune favors him, as with unerring aim, he disables some of his pursuers. Yet a shot finds it way home and Mohammed is unseated; he is dragged a considerable distance by the frightened horse, meeting with a swift and terrible death. In the concluding scenes the happy and smiling Fatma is seen with the man she loves, the chivalrous young lieutenant, for whom she has cherished an affection since the day he intervened to save her from Mohammed's obnoxious advances.

IMP.

FORGETTING (March 30).—She lived through girlhood and married without ever knowing what sympathy, affection and love really were. Her marriage was one of convenience; the man she married was unworthy of her and never displayed the attention and affection she craved.

As the months rolled by the husband began to neglect his wife for the society of other and less worthy women. It was at a week-end ball out in the country that the wife met a young man, the first to attract her seriously. Her friends had introduced her to this young man as a single woman and insisted on keeping up the joke. Acting in good faith, the boy wooed her with vigor and in time the wife loved him.

Then the awakening came; she explained it all to him and said that he must leave, never to return. Being honorable, he did so, but forgetting was another thing, so far as both of them were concerned. Days rolled by and two hearts were lonely. Later, the man read in the newspaper about the death of the husband in an automobile accident. Naturally, he returned to the girl and she, in time, received him, the man who understood and responded to her hunger for the right kind of love.

WHERE THERE'S A WILL THERE'S A WAY (April 9).—The lawyer notified the girl and the boy that they must marry each other to receive the inheritance. They have never seen each other and decide, without meeting, to live in pauperism rather than wed.

The girl, wearying of the lawyer's importunities, goes to the city with her maid. A tramp finds in the street a key to an apartment. He goes to the place designated on the tag and finds a well equipped bachelor apartment. He decides to rent the place and pocket the first month's rent. He inserts an ad., which is seen by the girl upon her arrival at Grand Central Station.

She rents the house and the tramp departs for regions unknown. That night the owner returns. Complications ensue. Each thinks the other a burglar. When the matter is explained it is late and the girl decides to remain there until morning. The next morning her aunt arrives and, to explain her presence in his apartment, the owner states that he has married her. This embarrasses the girl, but she finds the owner is not disagreeable. A hasty marriage is planned. He writes to the lawyer, telling him he is going to marry the woman he loves. This excites the lawyer, who rushes away to prevent the marriage. The young couple are before the minister by the time he arrives. But when he finds that fate and the tramp have brought together the very couple mentioned in the will, he breathes with relief and congratulations as he gives them the check for the inheritance.

MISS NOBODY FROM NOWHERE (2 parts—April 20).—Ethel is a girl of the slums. Threatened by her degenerate brother, Bowery Bob, she works making artificial flowers. Bob takes every cent she makes. Her only recreation is when Blind Tom plays his hand organ and she dances. Michael Delane, a dancing master, visits the slums and sees her dancing on the sidewalk. He gives Ethel his card. Later, after cruel treatment from Bob, she runs away and visits Delane at his studio. Seeing she has the makings of a great dancer and at this time he is in need of such a person for the new production of "Miss Nobody from Nowhere," he makes her an offer. She consents and tells him of her brother, Bob. Delane writes that Ethel is safe and at the same time sends Bob money, giving no address.

On the opening night Bob visits the theater and from the gallery sees his sister. Surprised, but pleased at seeing means for getting money, Ethel gives him aid time and time again. Delane professes love for Ethel; she accepts him. Later Bob asks for more money. Ethel refuses. Delane interferes. Bob, drunk at the time, tells Delane that Ethel is not his sister but his mistress. Delane leaves Ethel.

Heartbroken, Ethel cares for Blind Tom and later has his eyesight restored. Ethel helps the poor and dances at an entertainment to be given for the settlement workers. Here Delane happens to drop in and sees the girl. She realizes Bob needs more money and on seeing Delane on the street decides to try the old scheme once again. Delane is heartbroken and when Bob braces him there is a fight. Ethel, who has just left the Bowery hall, happens to see her brother draw his knife to kill Delane. Ethel interferes and is stabbed in the arm, falling to the ground. Bob sees his mistake and says, "My God! I've killed my sister." Delane hears this and quickly takes Ethel in his arms. Blind Tom has arrived on the scene by this time. Bob discovers a policeman on the other side of the street; he runs; the policeman rushes to the scene and sees what has happened. Blind Tom points to Bob, who is running up the street; the officer follows. Delane and Blind Tom rush Ethel to the hospital, where her arm is dressed and she soon recovers. In the meantime Bob has been chased into a building by the officer. Bob hiding behind the door of an elevator shaft misses his footing and falls to the bottom, dead. By this time big-hearted Blind Tom has repaid Ethel's kindness by bringing together Ethel and Delane.

THE STRANGER AT HICKORY NUT GAP (April 23).—"It tain't no use a dreaming. A moonshiner's daughter can't never be a lady." Poor little Nan, the moonshiner's daughter, is of a romantic turn of mind, but she finds little outlet for her pent up emotion and ambitions in the lean hut and the narrow life she is forced to lead. One day Nan's father is brought home dead by Lark. Lark is in love with her and proposes. But Nan, with her dream of Prince Charming, refuses, though she admires the rough and honest fellow of the hills. Later, Nan meets and remembers a detective, sent to run down the gang. Time passes. Nan works the still herself in order to secure nice clothes. One day, when the snow is deep upon the ground, the detective staggers to Nan's cabin and begs shelter. Nan recognizes him and takes him in.

Lark has heard that a revenue officer is in the hills and when he finds him at the cabin of Nan, he is furious. Nan, learning, is about to shoot the officer, but cannot. Lark attempts it, but the girl drives him out at the point of her own gun. In time Nan, ashamed of her past life, burns the still. The officer asks her to marry him and she consents, happy in the probability of realizing her dreams.

GOLD SEAL

THE EMBEZZLER (2 parts—March 31).—According to the play a sinister family skeleton overshadows and threatens to wreck the lives of two innocent persons—until the workers of evil defeat themselves by the same methods with which they at first gained ascendency over others. John Spencer had been a criminal at one time in his life—he feared the iron hand of the law. But as much as he feared the law falling upon his shoulder and forcing him to answer for his misdeeds of long ago, he loved his daughter. For her he sought to do right. Pauline was ignorant of her father's past and she idolized him as a good father and a man of principles.

Roger Dixon is the only man who knows of and can prove John Spencer's guilt. He makes this knowledge the basis of a systematic scheme of blackmail; the price of his silence growing larger day by day.

Pauline loves and is loved by Arthur, a young attorney. As time passes the blackmailer grows bold in his demands, and finally he threatens that if Pauline is not given to him in marriage he will send Spencer to states prison. The father, a moral coward, becomes party to a scheme to discredit Arthur in the girl's eyes. As an actor in the plot, Spencer goes to Arthur with a number of options which the young attorney is to investigate, but not to sell. Arthur gives Spencer a receipt for the options.

Dixon secures the assistance of two crooks, Dick, the penman, and Perkins. All three go to a restaurant to perfect their plans. With a half knowledge of the affair, Pauline follows Dixon and from a hiding place listens to the plans of the three men. Pauline returns to her father. He breaks down and tells her of his misconduct in early life and Dixon's power over him. To save him Pauline consents to marry Dixon.

In the meantime, Perkins steals the options from Arthur's office and the case against the attorney is complete. In paying off Dick, the penman, and Perkins for their services in the conspiracy, the crooks fall out and Dick shoots and kills Dixon. With Dixon the family skeleton in the closet of the Spencer residence also expires and happiness follows for all.

The child overhears her father instruct the nurse where to hide it until the birthday arrives. The temptation is too great for the child and she takes it outside of the house. Her neighbor, the daughter of a poor washerwoman, falls in love with the doll. The rich girl's father calls her and she, fearful lest he will discover that she took the doll, leaves it in the keeping of the poor girl. But the poor girl under no consideration is to touch the doll.

The poor girl watches, but the rich girl does not return. She is tempted to fondle the doll, but she remembers her promise. By and by the rain begins pouring down, but the child remains at her post and protects the doll with her apron. The outcome is that the poor girl contracts pneumonia. The rich man finds out too late of the poverty of his little neighbor and when his little girl takes her prettiest doll to the sick child, she receives it with just the faintest smile because she is dying.

THE RUBY CIRCLE (2 parts—April 9).—At an embassy ball Robert Carlton meets the girl of his dreams. He is attracted by an odd ring she wears, a circle of perfectly matched rubies. The following evening Carlton is jostled by an evil-looking fellow. Pausing to light a cigarette, he discovers a ring upon the sidewalk, a counterpart of that worn by the girl he loves. He places the ring on his finger.

Some evenings later Robert visits a Bohemian cafe. A distinguished looking foreigner enters; a gleam of satisfaction appears as he catches sight of the ring which Carlton wears. He drops a note into Carlton's lap and then leaves. Carlton finds the note a sort of cryptic invitation to follow. Outside the cafe he meets the stranger who, without a word, leads the way. Carlton follows into an evil-looking house.

Once inside the stranger leaves him. Carlton begins a tour of inspection when he hears a slight rustle. Turning, he is astonished to see the girl uppermost in his thoughts. She accuses him of being a detective. Carlton explains the affair. As she is about to help him out of the place the stranger returns with a dark robe. The girl is at her wits' end. Entering, Carlton finds himself in an underground council chamber containing thirty or forty strange figures clad like himself in long dark flowing robes. The leader of the meeting calls for the password. Carlton cannot give it. The leader, accusing him of being a spy, condemns him to death. Carlton is chained to the wall, beside a lighted bomb.

To save the man she loves, the girl leaves by a secret passage and informs the police. She saves her lover from the clutches of the Nihilists, by herself turning traitor to the cause.

That is, until Wood learns that Joel Dawson is his successful rival for the hand of June. Then Wood becomes stiffnecked. He circulates the report that Joel and June have been carrying on improperly. He has words with Joel, and in the general fight which follows Joel shoots and kills Wood.

Both families reopen hostilities. Hen Dawson forgets his oath and sets out to kill Joel. However, when he finds Joel he finds June with him ready to elope. Tragedy is about to take place, when the gospel man forever puts an end to the long-standing war of extermination. He marries Joel and June.

Briggs borrows this amount on his $10,000 life insurance policy. Briggs goes to his office before taking the train. A tramp has broken into the office and when Briggs arrives he hides. Briggs concludes his business and departs, leaving a lighted cigar behind. A fire is started. The tramp is burned to death.

Arriving in Chihuahua, Briggs' mission is misunderstood and he is thrown into prison as a spy. In the meantime the charred body of the tramp is found in the ruins of Briggs' office. Mrs. Briggs testifies that her husband was at the office at the time of the fire and the body is identified as that of Briggs. The life insurance is paid over to the supposed widow. She invests the money. Finally Briggs escapes from the Mexican prison and returns to find himself supposedly dead and his affairs in prosperous condition.

THE LION (April 20).—Warren Nolan, millionaire sportsman, nicknamed "The Lion," on account of his brute strength and the primitive rages he goes into on occasions, is engaged to Harriet Courtney, who vainly endeavors to win him away from his sporting habits. At the club one evening Hartley, one of the members, speaks lightly of Harriet. "The Lion" flies into a rage and fells him. The other members escape into an adjoining room. Warren, feeling for the heart of his victim, finds a letter making a tryst and takes this as proof of Harriet's infidelity. In the other room Dick, Warren's friend, suggests that for his own good they shanghai him and send him away. The others agree. "The Lion" is overpowered, drugged and placed in an outgoing freight box-car.

Three days later Warren, weak and sobered, crawls out of his prison to find himself in a small prairie town. Throwing away his coat and hat, he applies and secures a job at a nearby ranch. Here he is ridiculed by the cow-punchers. "The Lion" is about to fly into a rage when he remembers the results of his last outburst. The punchers brand him as a coward. She suspects the agent's intentions, however, and lays him low with a well-aimed blow. The brave girl then notifies the moonshiners of their danger. Red Eye Pete, one of the gang, attempts to steal the affections of Sue and is cruelly rebuked.

THE FRUIT OF EVIL (April 22).—The wife takes with her their small daughter, leaving the son to the care of the father. The forlorn woman wanders into a fishing village, and is taken into a kindly fisherman's family. To more surely separate herself from the world that knows her, she assumes her maiden name. Many years afterward the father and the son, now grown, pass through the village. The son becomes acquainted with his own sister, knowing nothing of the relationship, and falls in love with her. He persuades his father to spend his season at a summer resort nearby. Later, the son and the daughter are secretly married. The girl leaves a note for her mother, telling her of the act. The mother follows to the parsonage, and then the summer resort, where she overtakes the couple. The mother recognizes the father, and the young couple are told the horrifying news. Distracted, the girl runs away. After upbraiding his parent, the boy seeks out his father. Together they solve the tragic question which confronts them. Hand in hand they walk into the illimitable ocean until they are covered by the water.

THEIR HONEYMOON (April 24).—Eddie and Victoria, just married, are setting out to visit an uncle who lives in a nearby town, and whom neither have seen. However, they are expected. At the railroad station, a young doctor arrives with a demented man and woman, who labor under he delusion that they are newly married. He places the two in the train and then goes out on the platform to talk to a pretty girl. The natural thing happens. He misses the train, the same train upon which Eddie and Victoria are traveling. The doctor wires the superintendent of the asylum for two guards to meet the demented couple at the station. When the train pulls in, a blue-uniformed man steps up to Eddie and Victoria.

"You are just married, are you not?" he asks.

Once behind the bars of the insane asylum, no argument at their command will convince the asylum officials that they are not insane and both are locked up with the other maniacs. In the meantime, Eddie's uncle meets the two demented newlyweds and believing them to be his relatives takes them home as his guests. After they turn his quiet home in a madhouse, he realizes there must be some mistake and sends for the police. Eddie and Victoria escape from the asylum. The two cases of identity are straightened out, however, when the young doctor arrives on the scene.

ONE HOUR OF YOUTH (April 12).—When he tottered through the streets of his little home town people pointed him out as the "oldest inhabitant." At times this childishly pleased him, but on other occasions the old man regretted that his days of usefulness and activity were passed, and longed to be young again.

By great fortune he managed to attract the attention of a wonderful magician, who knew what he wanted, and found a way of giving it to him. Through a magical drink, which Myriah, master of mysteries, provided, the old man became young again for the short space of one hour. Within that time he went out and played in the snow, and even went in swimming in icey cold water surrounded with ice. What he did was real, but his little time of youthfulness was over all too soon, and at the end of the hour he was back as he had been before—a feeble, helpless old man, noted among his fellow townsmen only because of his great age.

He fails to find them, loses interest in his playing, and goes down. As the years pass he starts a small music store. The wife finds out her mistake in going with X. She dies brokenhearted, begging X to take care of her child, whom X sends to boarding school. X loses in the stock game and decides to marry a rich widow in order to recoup his fortune, but he loses more heavily and becomes ill. His friend, Z, refuses to help him, and much to the disgust of O, he has to send for the daughter, or have O see a photo of the daughter, Mary. He decides she is beautiful, and the only hope is to find Mary a rich husband to save them.

Mary, at school, still has violin lessons, and at a musicale given at school she plays, and is accompanied on the piano by Jack, her school chum's brother. Mary is called to her stepfather's house and meets his wife for the first time. All is strange to her. Mary is introduced at a ball given for her debut. Young men flock around her. Z is attracted. The next day Jack goes to the music store and purchases some music which he takes when he calls to see Mary. The stepfather, thinking over more financial loss, has an attack of heart trouble and dies. Scene of wife in lawyer's office. Jack calls again and again, but is refused admittance. THE HUNCHBACK (April 12).—"The Hunchback" earns a scanty living as a tinker, traveling from house to house, but on account of his deformity, there is no one who cares for him. Although a great lover of children, they flee at his approach. Taking pity on a little girl whose doll has been broken, he spends all his earnings to replace her plaything, and in consequence, the people with whom he boards, order him out. Tired and despairing, he gets, unobserved, into a freight car, and is carried to a western mining town.

There the wanderer finds friends in a miner and his little girl. An accident renders the little girl fatherless, and the hunchback brings the child to womanhood.

As the years pass the cripple grows to care for his ward, but when he tells her of his love, he finds that it is not returned. The girl falls in love with a young prospector, and the jealous hunchback seeks to take his life, and then weakens in his resolve. Later the prospector is in deadly danger and the hunchback decides to let him die. But when he recalls a promise he made to the girl's dying father and of his own desire for happiness, he makes the sacrifice and saves the life that means so much to her.

HIS PUNISHMENT (April 14).—Day after day O'Hara watched the roses wither on the cheeks of his daughter, Cathleen. And his longing to free her from the drudgery and danger of her work in no wise decreased when with the suddenness of fate an accident at her machine almost took her from him entirely. The foreman, observed, understood, and filed the knowledge in his memory for future use in the pitiless game for gain.

When the employer's persistent refusal to instal safety devices had threatened to precipitate a strike which he could ill afford; when to save his contracts he had been forced to submit to their demands of arbitration, and O'Hara had been chosen as the representative of his fellow workers, then the foreman realized that the opportunity for use of the knowledge he had gained was at hand.

Though other demands might be acceeded to, the very marrow of the bone of contention, the installation of safety devices must be passed through in the employer's favor, and for the purpose of bribing the delegate, a stated sum had been allowed the foreman, "enough to send Cathleen to school," was the bait the tempter offered. The foreman used his weapons well. When O'Hara left for the conference next day he carried with him, along with the good wishes of the workers he was to betray, a burden of conscience. And fifteen minutes later a messenger, bearing the news of Cathleen's injury, was hurrying after. Realizing how the news would affect O'Hara's decision, the foreman decided to stop the messenger. An exciting race ensued. Money's might was again brought into play. The messenger was delayed and arrived too late. O'Hara had signed away the rights of his fellow workers.

At the bedside of his daughter, Cathleen, O'Hara realizes his mistake, when the foreman tendered him the price of betrayal, of love and of his conscience.

THE WIDOW'S INVESTMENT (2 parts—April 20).—James Waldo, finding himself financially embarrassed, decides to form a fake oil company and sell stock. He forms a partnership with Henry Morgan, who is as unprincipled as himself. They go to Santa Maria, Cal., to carry on operations. James Waldo takes his daughter, Kate, an adventuress, that she may hold Morgan to his agreement. Morgan takes his wife, Rose, with him. She is a woman gifted with a beautiful character, but who has become estranged from her husband on account of his attention to other women.

Widow Green, of Santa Maria, invests her late husband's insurance in this fake oil stock. Soon after, Eben, her son, is forced to leave their farm and get employment. He is put to work on the oil drills of James Waldo. Eben falls in love with Marjorie, the daughter of the head driller, Stubbs. Stubbs, under the money influence of Waldo, becomes unprincipled and agrees to let Waldo know when they strike oil. They do strike oil and Waldo, with the assistance of Stubbs, hides the fact from the rest of the shareholders.

The shareholders, ignorant that oil has been struck, decide to let their stock go for the amount of the assessment, which Waldo insists must be made. He plans to buy this stock cheap. Eben discovers his plans, and, by a clever ruse, buys the assessment and gets control of the company. The oil stock increases in value. Eben marries Marjorie. Waldo finds out that "Honesty is the best policy," and Henry Morgan finds out that his wife's love is of more value than the smile of any other woman.

DAVID GRAY'S ESTATE (April 22).—
Over his forge bent David Gray
And thought of the rich man 'cross the way.

"Hammer and anvil for me," he said,
"And weary toil for my children's bread."

"For Him, soft carpets and pictured walls,
A life of ease in his spacious halls."

The clang of bells on his dreaming broke,
A flicker of flame, a whirl of smoke.

Horses unshod, forge grown white-hot,
Coat and hat were alike forgot.

As up the highway the blacksmith ran,
In face and mien a crazy man.

"School-house afire!" Men's hearts stood still
And the women prayed, as women will.

While 'bove the tumult the wailing cry
Of frightened children rose shrill and high.

Night in its shadows hid sun and earth;
The rich man sat by his costly hearth.

Lord of wide acres and untold gold,
But wifeless, childless, forlorn and old.

He thought of the family 'cross the way.
"I would," he sighed, "I were David Gray."

The blacksmith stood by his children's bed,
To look once more at each smiling head.

"My darlings all safe! Oh, God!" he cried,
My sin in Thy boundless mercy hide!"

"Only today have I learned how great Hath been Thy bounty and my estate."

Mary is so anxious about her father that she runs away from the convent to go in search of her father. She is rescued from a gang of toughs by Detective Callahan, who takes her to the address given her by her father and is much surprised to find that he is a saloon keeper and living in the rear of his saloon. Although Kelly is angry at his daughter for finding him, he makes the best of it and decides to keep her at home. He rents a better house and establishes Mary in her new home with a housekeeper. The wagon thieves have become more bold, and Callahan is close on their track. He calls on Mary and finds a bolt of silk that has been recently stolen. Mary tells him a friend of her father's has sold it to them. The police, headed by Callahan, make a raid on the thieves' rendezvous. Callahan corners a man in the cellar and is surprised to find that his man is Kelly. THIEVES (2 parts—April 16).—Richard Barr, who lives in the suburbs of New York, and John Colville, honest directors in a dishonestly managed corporation, are fighting to save their own investments, and those of small individual stockholders from ruin. They are holding a very important meeting which runs far into the night. Barr is called to the telephone by his wife, who has only time to tell him that burglars have entered the house, when the wires are cut. Barr is frantic at the thought of his wife's peril, but is loath to leave the meeting, knowing that the dishonest directors will put through their election if left alone. He explains the situation to them and leaves, making a quick dash in his car to his home to find his wife and boy bound and gagged. The burglars are captured as they are making a getaway. The wife explains that she saw the burglars enter the back door and quickly telephoned to him, but that the wires must have been cut and that Billy had held the burglars at bay for a short while with a revolver he had taken from her bureau, and when she realized where the child had gone the thought of her child's danger gave her courage and she attempted to save the child. Colville held the directors from voting at the point of a revolver, which proved later to be empty. His bluff went through and Barr reached the office in time to put the election through as he wanted it.

THE GOD OF VENGEANCE (Four Parts).—While in India, Colonel Burns, a well known curio collector, appropriates priceless jewels from an Idol in one of the Sacred Temples. In a secret vault in the mantel of his home he keeps the jewels. The East Indian sect relentlessly pursue the Colonel and threatens his life. He engages a detective to protect his daughter, Alice. The Hight Priest in India has demanded summary action against the Colonel, and Mr. Yosara takes an oath to return the jewels or forfeit his life. Ozada, a brother member, accompanies him, posing as a valet. Dr. Yosara becomes a guest at Colonel Burns' home by means of a letter of introduction from a friend of Colonel Burns. The letter states that Yosara is interested in curios and relics and wants to study Burns' collection.

Mutual love between Alice and Yosara makes his mission unpleasant. While at tea in the arbor an arrow alights on the table and a note attached reads—"We will wait no longer. The next time you will be the target." Colonel Burns calls a detective to his assistance. Ozada secures a drawing of the secret vault, by watching Burns through the keyhole and that night, while he and Yosara are attempting to locate the vault, Alice enters the room. Failing to allay Alice's suspicion, Yosara practices the art of hypnotism. The Colonel unexpectedly returns, accuses Yosara of being a traitor, and upon finding the drawing of the vault flays Yosara with a riding crop. Ozada springs into the fray, and as he is about to thrust a knife into the Colonel's back when Detective Smith pounces on him, and the arriving police arrest Yosara.

Ozada has escaped. Yozara is taken to prison, and his friends come to his rescue. The prison overlooks a river and when Yosara sights his friends in a row boat, he unravels his sock, ties a spoon to the end of the yarn and lowers the line. His friends attach a hack saw to the line. Yosara stuffs the keyhole of his cell door with a collar button and, after sawing the bars of the prison window, escapes down the rope. He is taken away in the row boat, but his escape has been discovered and the police boat gives chase.

Yosara's friends elude the police boat by running into shallow water and Yosara and Ozada, after leaving the row boat, make for Colonel Burns' home. The Colonel has been in a hospital since the fray with Yosara. Alice receives a note from her father telling her to return the sacred relic as it only brings misfortune. While she is looking at the jewels, Yosara dashes into the room and she gives him the relic. Ozada comes running into the room crying, "The police are here." Yosara carries Alice into an adjoining room. To escape the police, he sets fire to the room by dashing a kerosene lamp into a waste paper basket. The fire gets beyond control and, after a terrific struggle, he rescues Alice and carries her to a bench in the garden. Yosara is tempted to throw away the troublesome jewels but Ozada prevents the action. Detective Smith jumps over the garden wall and sees Yosara. Yosara runs away as Smith fires, hitting him in the back. Yosara makes his way to the sect room where the members are kneeling in prayer before the Image of God. He enters saying "I have kept my word, here are the jewels," and drops dead.

THE MASTER CRIMINAL (Four Parts)—Jacques Collin, a convict at the penitentiary of La Rochelle, known to his associates as the King, succeeds, despite a strict watch, to escape. A boat, manned by his accomplices and hidden amongst the rocks, carried him to safety. Changing his costume and assuming the name of Vautrin, he puts up at a boarding house, inveigles himself into the good graces of the inmates and seeks among them creatures who are likely to help him. In one of his visits to a strange cafe he is recognized by a noted detective, one Corentin, who, going up to him, grasps his shoulder and bluntly shouts: "Good day, Jacques Collin." The latter, on his guard, does not move a muscle. Corentin leaves furious, but not convinced. He keeps on his trail and, through an indiscretion, Collin is thrown into his hands and as he is arrested, shouts: "In six months I shall be free—then beware." He is as good as his word, and escaping, assumes the name of Councillor Don Carlos Heriera and is once more in the whirl. One day he follows the handsome Lucien De Rubenpre, who, tired of life, contemplates suicide. Collin, arriving on the spot, fascinates him, makes a tool of him, and fills his head with a dream of the conquest of Paris. He and Esther, another tool in the hands of Collin, are thrown into one another's society constantly, and Esther falls in love with Lucien. Collin gets angry, Esther is not rich—she must have money. The banker, Baron De Nucingin, can give that to her. Collin arranges to have her seen in the box of a theater and the banker immediately falls into the trap. Corentin has not abandoned his quarry, but is still hot on his trail. Esther is now in the swim. Mucingin has presented her with a regal mansion, which she has accepted through sheer fear of the Master Criminal, who holds her in his power just as he holds Lucien. Maddened by grief, she seeks solace in death. Collin has been advised by his aunt, who is Esther's housekeeper, to come to her at once. On the way she is accosted by Corentin brandishing a warrant. As he approaches to serve it, Collin upsets him by a blow in the stomach and again makes his escape. Rushing into the house, he seeks refuge on the roof, the detectives in close pursuit. A struggle takes place, and Collin, who is as strong as an ox, takes hold of the detective and hurls him into the street below. Lucien in the meantime is arrested and as justice always triumphs, so Collin eventually is incarcerated. Lucien, fearing the penalty of his crime, ends his life, and when Collin is informed of the fact, he is thunder-struck and falls to the ground limp and powerless. The Master Criminal is brought before the magistrate, having in his possession valuable and incriminating letters against three of the first families of France and offers a a compromise that he go free and be appointed Chief of Police, in exchange for the letters which he holds. The compromise is effected and Collin, turning over a new leaf, becomes Master Criminal Hunter instead of Master Criminal.

THE ANGEL OF THE MINE (Three Reels).—Robert Demont, a mine owner, wealthy and aristocratic, has among other employees a young girl, Sophie, who, by her uniform kindness and cheerfulness, has endeared herself to the entire community, so much so that they have given her the affectionate sobriquet of "The Angel of the Mine." STEEL GEARS vs. DIE CAST DIE CAST GEARS COST A SMALL PART of what Steel Gears do, because Die Cast Gears are made by pressing molten metal, consisting of Lead, Zinc., etc., into steel dies. The cold steel chills and hardens a thin skin on the surface, which soon wears through.

DIE CAST GEARS often last about a year (to live out the Guarantee), then the replacing of such low cost parts becomes A TREMENDOUS SOURCE OF PROFIT to the Manufacturer, but we have not used them, because WE knew they would not give good service.

escorts Sophie to her humble home, but fails to read the secret of her love in her tearful tell-tale eyes. Black Dan somehow learns of the new vein. His opportunity has come. Descending by means of a rope into the ravine, he waits until a group of miners, led by Robert and Sophie, are preparing to blast the rocks, and then throws a lighted torch into the dynamite, killing a few miners and burying Robert and Sophie.

While they are imprisoned Sophie finds a little water and bathes Robert's wound, but as he is very weak from loss of blood, the heroic girl opens a vein in her wrist and gives him new life by transfusing her own fresh young blood into his. Afterwards, while half delirious from hunger and exhaustion, she confesses her love for him and he, mistaking a feeling of gratitude for that of love, asks her to marry him if they are rescued. After many hours of imprisonment they are found by the searchers and restored to strength. Robert takes Sophie to his mother's house and introduces her as his fiancee, but Mrs. Demont, an aristocrat to her fingertips, cannot endure Sophie's ignorance of the ways of refined households and shows her feelings so plainly that Sophie is very unhappy. To add to her distress, while at a reception, she discovers Robert and Lydia Seymour, a girl of his own station in life, together in the conservatory. Overhearing their conversation, she realizes that he considers himself bound by his vows to her while really loving Lydia. Though only a peasant girl, her great heart shows the true nobility of her character. She writes Robert a note that she has been mistaken in her feeling for him and can never love him sufficiently to become his wife, thus freeing him of his obligation, while she sorrowfully wends her way back to her old friends to resume her place among them as "The Angel of the Mine."

Pryde sees with sorrow that his partner, Grace, is sacrificing herself so that she can supply her frivolous sister, Stella, with every luxury. He remonstrates—but Grace explains that Stella is a show girl—that her expenses for costumes, etc., are heavy—the temptations of the life are great and that she doesn't want her to accept favors from any man—during her husband's absence abroad. She feels that she must supply Stella's needs. Pryde, knowing how frivolous Stella is, offers her all the money she needs—on the condition that she will take no more from Grace—and will repay back what she has already gotten. Pryde is well able to do this for he has just come into a title and fortune, but hesitates to tell the girl news to Grace, fearing it may make a difference in their relations. Stella accepts his proposition and returns money that Grace gave her. But Grace finds out that it is Pryde's money that her sister has returned, and also that Pryde is now a wealthy man. She feels hurt that Pryde had not seen fit to tell her everything. Stella, being wild and frivolous, soon gets into trouble. One night as she returns from the theater with a friend, she discovers that a man had been murdered in her flat. She appeals to Grace to help her—she declares to them that she only knew the dead man slightly and did not invite him to her flat. She also shows them a telegram, stating that her husband would arrive home at any moment. Pryde believes her and investigates—finds that the tragedy really belongs upstairs.

They remove the body to the flat above and wait for the arrival of the occupant who on arriving and by her screams convinces them that they were right. Stella's husband arrives and now that he is there to care for her in future, Grace and Pryde are very much relieved and are drawn closer together by the tragedy that nearly entered their lives.

THE GREAT LEAP (Four parts).—Mary Gibbs is the daughter of a Kentucky mountaineer who falls in love with Bobby Dawson, the son of the leader of a clan with whom Gibbs is in dispute regarding the boundary of his land. During the several encounters between the two warring factions, a member of one of the clans is killed, which starts a battle royal between the two families.

Mary Gibbs and her father are attacked by their enemies and are driven into their home, which they barricade and continue to fight. Mary, realizing that her lover is among those in the attacking party, and fearing that he may be killed, manages to escape from her house, and after gaining the shelter of the woods, attracts his attention, and together they flee mounted upon his horse. The other members of his band, seeing what has happened, follow in hot pursuit. Mary urges their horse to full speed to take a road which leads directly to a precipitous cliff which drops sheer into the river. Before realizing the danger ahead they are upon it, and the horse in the mad race for life is unable to stop in time, dashes madly from the cliff into space. Horse and riders fall into the waters below and providentially are uninjured and able to swim to safety on the opposite shore, for their pursuers realizing that they have gone over the cliff have given them up for lost.

Old man Gibbs has seen the daring feat, and admiring such great courage and fortitude, prevents his son, the girl's brother, from sending a death messenger from his rifle to the heart of young Bob. Later the boy and girl wandering through the woods, meet the old man and his son, and the last of the Dawsons becomes the accepted husband of Mary.

THE GANGSTERS (Four parts).—The Dugan family lives in a crowded tenement on the lower East Side of New York. Biff is the leader of a notorious gang, and Porkey, his young brother, is a faithful follower. Even Jimmie, his kid brother, has a gang of his own. Jessie, the sister, works hard in a sweatshop, refuses to touch any of the stolen money which her brothers offer her, and strives to keep the home together on her earnings.

Cora Drew, a girl from the country, is working in a factory and living in a room next to the Dugan family. She meets Porkey, who protects her from the advances of the district political leader, but refuses to accept his attentions because of his bad habits and associates. The politician, Hennessy, engages Biff's gang to stuff the ballot boxes. Cora, thinking the only way to get Porkey to have him arrested, informs about the arrest of both Porkey and Biff, but they come out of prison more hardened than ever. In a fight which follows, Hennessy is killed by his own gun, and Biff, who is not guilty, is "framed up" and sent to the electric chair. Porkey, who has only a short prison sentence, returns to old scenes to renew the combat, but his gang is disorganized and he is wounded. At last, however, the man who swore his brother's life away it at his mercy. He starts to slay the perjurer, but the influence of Cora, whom he truly loves, restrains him and he sets the wretch free. Porkey and Cora then go to the country, where love and outdoor life make this former gangster a real man.

THE BATTLE OF THE SEXES (Five parts).—Frank Andrews, a successful business man—a man who has always found pride and joy in the company of his wife, but her frail nature—suddenly finds himself enthralled by the advances of a gay young woman—a siren, who lives in the same apartment house. So marked an influence does she have over him as time progresses that at last he quite forgets his home ties, neglects his family and goes the way of many other men who have forgotten the meaning of paternity and blood ties. The story is advanced through many scenes enacted with the accompanying notes of New York's night life, and the denouement comes when the faithful wife discovers her husband's infidelity. At this time the mother's mind nearly loses balance, while Jane, the beautiful daughter, crazed by the grief of her mother, determines to take part in the tragedy. With revolver in hand she steals up to the apartment of the woman, but her frail nature is overcome by the temperamental anger of the woman and her mission fails. However, the errand is not fraught with failure, for the father, coming in at this moment, finds his daughter being made love to by the sweetheart of the young woman, and realizes the road upon which he has traveled. When he confronts his daughter and says, "You, my daughter—what are you doing here?"—the daughter answers, "My father, what are you doing here?" The realization is brought home to the father's mind that the law of moral ethics that governs a woman's life necessarily governs that of man as well. Reformation comes in his character. He takes his daughter away with him and together they go back to their home of happiness and content.

HEPWORTH AMERICAN.

THE MURDOCK TRIAL (Four parts).—When John Storey died suddenly in India, his daughter, Helen, an only child, became heiress to his estate, worth some £20,000. Although Helen was nearly of age, she knew practically nothing of the world and less about her father's affairs. News of Storey's demise reached his agent in England. Mr. Henry Murdoch, at a time when that gentleman was in deep financial distress. Holding full power of attorney over Storey's investments, he was tempted by a suggestion from his worthless and rascally nephew to take advantage of Helen's ignorance, and for the time being to make use of the Storey money to pull himself out of the mire. To avoid danger of detection the nephew further suggested destroying a letter from Storey, which would have served not only as a will, but would be the only document which could incriminate Murdoch in the event of his carrying out his intentions.

Watching his chance, the nephew secretly pocketed the letter and burned a blank sheet of paper in its stead. The ashes completely deceived Murdoch, who fell easily into the trap, thereby putting himself entirely into the hands of his unscrupulous nephew. Helen came to live in the Murdoch household, but after months of grieving, her health was becoming undermined, and Murdoch, acting on his nephew's advice, sent Helen into the country, accompanied by the housekeeper. This change was very acceptable to Helen, principally because the nephew insisted in paying her most unpleasant lover-like attentions. The country air did wonders for Helen, but the thing which hastened her recovery more than anything else was her happiness in winning the love of Lionel Mann. All went smoothly until the housekeeper wrote to Murdoch of Helen's love affair. Again the nephew influenced Murdoch by pointing out the possibility of prison in case Helen married some clever young man who might investigate her affairs for her.

The only safe course that Murdoch could see to follow was to marry Helen himself, and to that end he ordered her home at once. One day Lionel called to see Helen, but Murdoch, driven by fear and jealousy, grossly insulted him and ordered him off the premises. By the time Lionel reached the station he was impelled by fear for Helen, at the mercy of an apparent madman, to return. Meanwhile Murdoch brought matters to a crisis by trying to force Helen to submit to his loathsome love-making, but the nephew's arrival on the scene saved her from his persecution. Murdoch, thoroughly enraged, was in no mood to listen to a demand for money, and when the nephew threatened to make use of the letter written by Storey to compel him to give in, Murdoch endeavored to force him to give up the letter by attacking him with a dagger-like bill file. Their fighting attracted the butler, who arrived at the door in time to see the nephew give his uncle a fatal thrust. The sudden shock completely unhinged the butler's mind and he fell unconscious to the floor. Helen also heard the noise and came into the room at the moment Lionel stepped through the French window left open by the escaping nephew. Under the circumstances each thought the other guilty of the tragic deed and, before they had time to explain, the housekeeper entered the room. Lionel, seeking to protect Helen, ordered her not to say a word to anyone, which appeared on the face of things to be an admission of guilt on his part.

At the trial, Lionel, still endeavoring to defend Helen, made no defence and was consequently convicted and sentenced to death. As he stood to receive his sentence, Helen realized his innocence, and to the consternation of everyone in court, she obeyed a sudden impulse and convinced them all that she had committed the crime herself. The night before her execution, the butler, now sufficiently recovered to be allowed the freedom of the sanitorium to which he had been sent, read an account of Helen's sensational confession at the trial. Horrified, he tries to explain the awful mistake, but, of course, was not believed. At a late hour that evening he escaped from the sanitorium and reached the house of the defending counsel, where he found Lionel. Realizing the only chance of obtaining a reprieve lay in surprising the nephew into an admission of guilt, they went to the Murdoch home and by a clever ruse succeeded in accomplishing their errand. A desperate fight ensued and the nephew was taken prisoner. Then, armed with a reprieve signed by the Home Secretary, they arrived at the goal just in time to prevent a most serious miscarriage of justice.

THE GREAT GOLD ROBBERY (Three Parts).—Four crooks are planning a raid on a huge consignment of gold from South Africa, which is to be loaded at a Thames wharf. Two dress themselves as policemen and wait in ambush. When the treasure van comes along with a policeman on guard, a clever trick is pulled by which the driver and the policeman guard are gotten out of the way and the treasure van driven off by the disguised crooks, who hide the gold in the river. Walter Hyde, a Thames River guard, attending the police boat at the water's edge, overhears the plotters and tracks them. Detected, after a hard battle, he is captured and tied up. The crooks put him in the basket of an enormous crane and swing him high aloft.

Dot, Hyde's sweetheart, and her father wait vainly for Walter to keep his appointment with her at the wharf. An hour passes and Walter is still missing. Dot sees a handkerchief waving at the edge of the huge crane basket. It is Walter, weak from his rough handling, signalling for help. Scenting a mystery, Dot dispatches her father for the police and herself crosses the river and daringly climbs the crane's framwork. A slip would mean death, but up and up she goes till she is in the

WHERE IS COLETTI? (Four Parts).—This production tells the story of the famous detective, Coletti, of Berlin. Coletti has taken charge of a bank robbery case, and the editor of the Continental Daily Mail publishes an article in which he chides the detective for mismanagement of the case. As it was known the criminal remained in Berlin for forty-eight hours after the robbery; the article claimed that had Coletti published and distributed broadcast a description of the criminal some one of the millions of inhabitants of Berlin would have captured him. In an open letter to the editor of the paper, Coletti states it is almost impossible to unearth a man hidden away in as large a city as Berlin, and, to back up his statement, offers a reward of $25,000 to any person who can capture him within forty-eight hours after a full description of himself, and his photograph, have been printed in every newspaper, and posted all around the city. The challenge is accepted.

All the inhabitants of Berlin, except Anton, the barber, and Lolette, Coletti's fiancee, are seeking the detective. Anton disguises as the detective, and Coletti assumes the disguise of a street sweeper. Freely mingling with the crowd, Coletti keeps his eyes open for Anton, whom he presently sees boarding a bus. Then a wild mob pursues Anton, but the athletic barber makes his escape by jumping from the fast going vehicle. After running a short distance he sees a Zeppelin airship about to sail away. In a mad jump he succeeds in boarding the airship, which has a great many passengers on board. Taking a seat, Anton calls for a drink, and is very much astonished to find that the waiter who serves him is Coletti himself. Finally a stout lady passenger observes Anton, and feeling confident she has captured Coletti, keeps a firm hold on the collar of Anton's coat. When the airship descends she marches poor Anton off to the editor's office to claim the $25,000. While the mob that has followed the fair stout lady are cheering her to the top of their lungs, Anton calmly removes his disguise, and distributes his business cards—and then they realize they have been tricked.

In the meantime, Coletti has constantly mingled with the masses in various disguises. Then a celebrated police dog is put on the trail of Coletti. While Coletti and his sweetheart are enjoying themselves at a nearby cafe the crowd follows the police dog. The dog is on the scent, tugging at the leash with all his might he makes for the cafe. As they enter the cafe Lolette begins to dance; while Coletti goes into an adjoining room and changes back to his own clothing. Time has been flying fast; the mob has been watching in admiration the dancing of Lolette; then the inner door opens and a wild dash is made at the man who enters—Coletti himself, who calmly raising his hand, says, "Yes, you have caught me, but—you are five minutes too late."

THE DEATH BALLOON (Three parts).—Two little orphaned sisters named Katherine and Margaret, lived with their grandfather, Neilsen, the old bellringer, their only protector and guardian. Uneventful and monotonous was their lives. Helping grandfather ring the church bells calling the villagers to prayer was their one greatest pleasure. Looking from the church tower one evening, they saw a most unusual procession approaching them. There appeared a beautiful pageant of men, women, horses, wagons and a brass band. It was the circus coming to town. Katherine and Margaret excitedly beg their grandfather's consent and ask for money to attend the performance.

Of all the wonderful attractions they saw at the circus that evening, they were most interested in the marvelous acrobatic feats performed by a slender handsome youth called Fred, while suspended from the top of a balloon high in the air. Unusual enthusiasm of Katherine and Margaret is noticed by Fred. The three become very good friends. On the night that the circus was to leave town, Fred calls on the little sisters to say good-bye. Before leaving he tells Katherine if she ever needs a friend to look for him. At his departure he leaves a note in Katherine's hand, which reads, "Look for the Circus Casperi when you want me."

Two weeks after Fred's departure, after a short illness the grandfather dies, leaving Katherine and Margaret penniless, friendless and without a home. Katherine remembers Fred's note. She decides to find him. Scanty belongings are hastily packed. A last visit is made to grandfather's grave to place flowers thereon and say farewell. Katherine and Margaret wander from town to town inquiring, "Can you tell us where the Circus Casperi is playing?" Footsore and weary they find the circus. Fred sees them approach, and warmly welcomes them. They tell him of their trouble. Fred invites them to join him in his act with the circus, which they agree to do after overcoming the objections of the circus manager and his wife. Years roll by. As performers they have become famous. They now appear only in the largest and most popular arenas, before the most critical audiences. Their act is in great demand.

Katherine and Margaret have grown to beautiful womanhood, and resemble each other so much that one is often mistaken for the other. (This wonderful resemblance is the direct cause of the ensuing tragedy). Fred has learned to love Katherine, who gladly returns his affections. Fame, contentment and wealth is now theirs. The only cloud on their happiness is the uncontrollable jealousy and unwarranted suspicion of Fred, so intense is his love for Katherine. Fred's jealous nature reveals itself one day as they are enjoying evening meal. Count Ehrenstern, a popular and well-known nobleman, enters the restaurant with several friends. The Count is attracted by Margaret's beauty. Indulges in a flirtation with her. Is encouraged by Margaret, who leaves the room to meet the Count. A companion of the Count tries, but fails to interest Katherine. Fred, much excited, blames both girls. Wants to fight with the Count's friends, but is prevented from doing so.

Fred, now thoroughly aroused, goes to room. Tries, but is unable to sleep. He arises, dresses himself, and decides to walk in the park. After several hours, he returns to hotel exhausted. It is now early morning. As he opens his room door he hears footsteps softly approaching. He looks down hotel corridor and sees the figure of a woman entering her room. He mistakes this woman for his sweetheart, Katherine. "So!" cries Fred, "my suspicions were well grounded." At breakfast Fred accuses Katherine and demands an explanation of her conduct of the previous night. Katherine, to protect her sister, Margaret (who was really guilty of indiscretion with the Count), refuses to satisfy Fred. Fred leaves them in rage.

Sisters, now thoroughly frightened, decide that full confession by Margaret will only save the situation. She (Margaret) goes to dressing-room to see Fred, but it is too late. The time has already arrived to begin the balloon act.

As Fred enters the balloon-basket, the immense audience rose as one person. He shouts instructions to girls to get on balloon rope ladder. Then the ropes are cut, and the immense balloon rises hundreds of feet in the air.

Fred starts to help Katherine into the balloon-basket, when the scenes of the previous night come before him. A desperate and horrible idea enters his mind. Suicide! A moment he hesitates, then deliberately dashes himself headlong into space. The audience gasps, sickens, as they see the body fall to earth, a lifeless, inert, crushed mass. Thus unwarranted jealousy and suspicion caused Fred to sacrifice his life for one who had never betrayed him.

The balloon, with its human cargo now left without pilot to guide its course, sailed away into space, and was never heard of since. What was the fate of Katherine and Margaret?

THE OTHER MAN'S WIFE (Six parts).—Julien Barbour is employed as a bookkeeper and secretary by the firm of Forrest and Patton. The consideration these employers have for their employee reaches to the extent of their proposing a marriage to him with the niece of Dr. Spangler, a particular friend of theirs. The niece is tall and lean, while Barbour is of the other type—fat. Mr. and Mrs. Forrest are very much attached to each other and at every opportunity express their love in a most pronounced manner, much to the disgust of Mr. and Mrs. Patton. Mrs. Patton, however, is a very frivolous woman and conducts a secret correspondence with a certain Armand.

During the course of business at the office of Messrs. Forrest & Patton, a telegram is received, which necessitates their leaving for Sardinia. Mrs. Forrest is thereupon placed by her husband in charge of Julien Barbour, who is instructed in strong terms to guard his (Mr. Forrest's) dear wife and household while away. The wily Mrs. Patton is determined to take advantage of her husband's absence and for company induces Henriette to join her to the shore, stopping at the Hotel Sea View, for she is to meet Armand there.

Now poor Julien Barbour is no match for the clever Mrs. Forrest, who succeeds in entrapping him through a letter that is induced to write expressing his love for her. Using this as a threat, she succeeds in joining Mrs. Patton on the trip to the Hotel Sea View. When Barbour finds his mistress gone, and being deeply concerned about his charge, he determines to follow her, and although he misses the train, he continues his pursuit by inducing an engineer to follow the fleeting pair.

Forrest and Patton, upon arriving at the dock to leave for Sardinia, find the boat going out. What can these two poor husbands do under such trying circumstances? The summer season being at its height and its oppressive heat adding discomfort to disappointment, they naturally decide to spend the day at the shore since, at any rate, they cannot return in time to their place of business—and so we find them at the very hotel selected by their wives, who are supposed to be at home.

The hilarious part of the comedy now begins with the two husbands let loose, one of whom though is deprived of his joyous plans on account of taking a dose of medicine for seasickness, since he felt certain of catching the boat for Sardinia. One of the plans of Mr. Forrest in order to hide his identity is to use the visiting cards of his secretary, who is also at the shore, being busily engaged guarding his attractive mistress. The effect of the double burden of responsibility now heaped upon the shoulders of poor Barbour may be imagined, but what follows should be seen on the screen.

A VENETIAN NIGHT (Four parts).—Venice! What emotions it awakens in the Young Stranger as he reads about it in his book. He decides to pay this beautiful city a visit. Upon his arrival, he walks from the railroad station to the landing-place on the Grand Canal. There the crowd watches him with amusement as he blunderingly makes his way.

Pitrello, a hotel tout, sees in the awkward Young Stranger a likely mark. He seizes his baggage, hurries him into a gondola and conducts him through a network of canals and bridges to the hotel. In the meantime, the Bridegroom, a rich wine merchant, is escorting his young Bride to the church where they are to be married. She is unutterably sad because her heart is elsewhere. Suddenly her face lights up! Nearby stands the Officer, her true love! And now the gondola of the Young Stranger nears the scene. He lands and, as he is looking about curiously, the bridal party passes and he is smitten with the beauty of the pale Bride.

After the services the bridal party proceeds toward the hotel, the same one for which the Young Stranger is headed. The Young Bride cannot forget her Officer. She throws a rose to him as he stands below looking at her pleadingly. The Young Stranger, mistaking her intention, thinks the rose is meant for him. A merry wedding feast is held in the courtyard of the hotel. The Officer waits for stolen sweets and the Bride smiles at him. Her smiles the Young Stranger intercepts and takes for himself Love's message meant for another. While the dancing continues, the Bride pleads sudden indisposition and retires to her room. The Young Stranger in an adjoining room goes to sleep with the rose of his romance at his lips. The events of the day had made a deep impression upon him, and now his brain, active in sleep, conjures up before him a wonderful dream.

At first all the people he met during the events of the day pass before him in a shadowy dance. Then he sees the room of the Bride. Lo! Within it stands the Officer, pleading with her. There is a knock at the door. What shall she do? She hides him behind the curtains and the Bridegroom enters. He has been drinking very freely.

But now Pitrello drops from the upper transom. Unseen by the Bridegroom, he stealthily creeps behind the curtain and engages in mortal combat with the Officer. He kills the Officer, but so swiftly and silently is this accomplished that only the Bride, her face turned toward the combatants, is aware of the tragedy. She renews her pleading with her husband that he leave her room for the night. He yields to her request. The criminal Pitrello had, in the meantime, escaped. Terror-stricken, the Bride hides the dead body in her own bed. From the Young Stranger's room the Bride hears a song of love. An idea occurs to her. She will ask him to dispose of the body for her. He sees her, dresses rapidly and follows. The Young Stranger pleads his love. Suddenly the Bride horrifies him by showing him the corpse. She entreats him to help her. At first he is reluctant, but finally he consents.

The Young Stranger drags the body to the balcony. Pitrello, however, dogs his every step and frustrates his intentions. Here is an opportunity. The deep well! Into its depth the dead body will go. But no! Pitrello squats upon the lid and the Young Stranger drags the corpse to a boat. He boards the boat with his dreadful charge; so does Pitrello. For the far-off shores of the Island of the Dead he steers and there he throws the body into the silent waters of the lagoon. At last he is free to rejoin the Bride. But Pitrello leaps into the waters and drags the body back to shore. Then he conjures up three more bodies. He sets them up, one after another, like so many nine-pins and the Young Stranger recoils from the ghastly sight. Outlined in shadow, the little craft re-crosses the waters of the lagoon.

When the Young Stranger lands, however, he is again confronted with peril. The Officer, come to life, rushes at him, sword in hand. They fence and the Young Stranger is victorious. Another Officer, however, leaps toward him! Another scuffle! Thus he struggles with the four and kills them. But he has reckoned without Pitrello. His Evil Genius breathes back the spark of life into them. They arise and pursue the fleeing Young Stranger. A vast mob brandishing weapons follows after. But the Young Stranger manages to reach the Bride's room. There he relates his fearful misadventures. She listens to him sadly and at last rewards him with a kiss!

The drinking and dancing had continued in the lobby of the hotel all through the night. The Bridegroom, drunk, is conducted by the servants, under the leadership of Pitrello, into the Young Stranger's room. They deposit the Bridegroom on the Young Stranger's bed. But the Young Stranger soon begins to feel the weight of his little bed partner. The Bridde has come out smiling and inquires after her husband. There is much commotion among the servants working eagerly for the much coveted tips. Pitrello, ever quick, has stirred into action even the lazy fellow, who, tired from the revelry of last night, is sleeping on the stairs. All is bustle and hurry-scurry as the bridal party leaves in a gondola. Poor Yound Stranger! His dream of love cannot stand the daylight of reality. Sadly he notes how the Bride has made room in the gondola for the Officer.

The fat Bridegroom is too stupid to know her real feelings, but the Young Stranger understands! He presses to his lips the cherished rose of sweet romance, and as the bridal party glides under the bridge on which he is standing, he showers its petals upon her.

BREWSTER'S MILLIONS (Five Parts).—Robert Brewster, a scion of a well-to-do family, elopes with Louise Sedgewick. Peter Brewster disinherits Robert and refuses to be reconciled to the marriage, and later drives the young couple from their home. A little son, "Monty," blesses the union. When Monty is a full grown man, Peter Brewster dies and bequeaths a million dollars to him.

The newly acquired wealth staggers young Monty Brewster, and he is about to launch into the new life as one of the predatory rich, when he receives a communication from an attorney in the West, advising him that his uncle, George Brewster, has left him seven million dollars, contingent upon his getting rid of the million dollars left him by Peter Brewster.

"Peter Brewster mistreated your mother and father and I do not want you to touch a dollar of his money. If you spend the million left to you by him and can, at the end of a year, show by receipts that you have judiciously spent, not squandered this million dollars, my attorneys will turn over to you my worldly possessions, aggregating seven millions. You must own nothing of value at the end of the year," said George Brewster, and Monty, learning for the first time that Peter Brewster had mistreated his parents, begins to spend the million.

He invests the money in a sure losing proposition in Wall Street in an effort to dispose of some of his unwelcome money, and the proposition turns out a winner. He backs a flabby fat pugilist, hoping to lose, and wins.

There is a clause in the will of George Brewster which says that Monty must not tell anyone of his desire to spend the million and his friends think he has suddenly lost his mind. Everything Monty touches with the hope of losing some of his money, turns out just the reverse, and he wins. He has a most terrible time disposing of the undesired millions.

Finally, in a desperate attempt at magnificent spending, Monty hires a palatial yacht, invites several dozen friends to accompany him and goes on a long cruise. The friends mutiny in mid-ocean, thinking him suddenly insane the way he is squandering his wealth, and threaten to lock Monty up, but Monty, to frustrate them, runs up a signal of distress. It costs him two hundred thousand dollars to be salvaged by a passing steamer, and the end of the year rolls around with Monty flat broke.

He has squandered the entire million dollars, possesses a room full of receipts to show for every dollar spent, and his sweetheart, Peggy, believing him to be a pauper, consents to marry him. His friends, believing him broke, endeavor to press money and jewelry upon him, all of which he must not have in his possession or he loses the seven million. He dodges his friends, is met by the attorney and presented with seven million dollars, and everything turns out happily.

THE HINDU NEMESIS (Four parts).—Mr. Deleron, a retired banker, gave up active business in order that he could devote all of his attention to his wife and two young children, Helen and Edward. When he was at the height of his banking career, many years ago, he was instrumental in having Hassen Amru, an East Indian, imprisoned for debt.

One day when returning home from a drive, Mr. Deleron did not notice a stranger in the street opposite his house. Hassen Amru, after being in prison for many years, had escaped. The unobserved stranger was there for revenge. Several days later, the East Indian meets an old clockmaker who had been employed to repair a grandfather's clock in the Deleron home. Hassen arranges to get his help in a revengeful plot. The clockmaker agrees and enters the banker's house. Just as he starts to work he hears the voices of Mr. and Mrs. Deleron nearing him, and not wishing to be seen, hides in the clock until the banker and his wife leave. Before leaving, they place the children in the care of their nurse.

No sooner have the Delerons departed than the nurse leaves the children to care for themselves and goes for a tete-a-tete with the butler. The old man steps from out of the clock, and hides behind the portieres where the children are playing. The children are playing with the furniture and ornaments, and in one of their pranks Edward takes Helen's locket and is about to reach for a vase when suddenly the portieres open and the old man grabs him and disappears.

Shortly afterward the parents return home. The butler has discovered that little Edward is gone. Mr. and Mrs. Deleron enter the room and find Helen in the arms of her nurse. Mr. Deleron immediately notifies the police, but no clue can be found.

Fifteen years now elapse, and Mr. and Mrs. Deleron and Helen are living in a magnificent villa in East Park. Helen is engaged to be married to Herbert Garwood, a lawyer. A very important business matter, which means Herbert's future, is coming up in another city, and it is necessary for him to leave and remain away for several weeks. Before going, he purchases a seat for her at the Apollo Theater, where an East Indian Theatrical company is appearing in "The Mephisto Dance."

After the performance, Helen is assaulted by an intoxicated man. Being unescorted, she calls for help. Her cries are heard by Olaf Buward, a member of the East Indian troupe. Olaf frees her from the drunkard. Helen faints in the arms of her rescuer. At that moment her carriage arrives, and she is helped in by Olaf. Helen thanks her protector for his act of chivalry, and before driving off, hands him her card, with an invitation to call at her home. Hassen has now taken the name of Guy Buward, manager of the East Indian Theatrical Troupe. Olaf goes home and tells Guy of his odd adventure. He shows him Helen's card and Buward is stunned at the sight of the name Deleron. Guy insists that Olaf visit the girl he rescued. Ruth, who is madly in love with Olaf, hears of the adventure also, but does not place much faith in it.

One afternoon, several days later, Olaf visits the Delerons. He is graciously received and thanked by Helen's parents for protecting her. Time quickly flies, and Olaf must leave and dress for the night's performance. After the performance that night Olaf tells Guy of his love for Helen. Guy learns with diabolical satisfaction that brother and sister are falling in love with each other.

Mr. Deleron and his wife are sitting in their apartments. Deleron falls asleep and his wife leaves. The window suddenly opens and a masked head appears. Entering the room, the figure cautiously places a note near the banker. In leaving, the window is closed abruptly, and the noise awakens Deleron, who finds the following missive, "Keep your eyes open. Your son is near you. If you doubt this statement, you will find the missing locket and the photograph of your child." Mr. Deleron is startled. Mr. Deleron is very much interested in the East Indian Theatrical Company and invites them to his home the next day. Guy Buward does not accept the invitation, but Ruth and Olaf agree to come. After tea, Helen and Olaf are alone in the music room. Olaf tells her of his love and asks her to marry him. Helen loves Olaf, but tells him of her betrothal to the young lawyer. She shows him her engagement ring and also a letter from Herbert, stating he will soon return to claim her as his own. Olaf pleads with her to return his love, which she does, and their engagement is sealed with a kiss. Ruth enters just in time to witness this and in a rage of jealousy brings Mr. Deleron. Helen and Olaf are found in each other's arms. The banker scolds his daughter, but Olaf tells of their love and asks for his consent to their marriage. The father refuses and the young East Indian departs. Before leaving, he meets the butler and with his assistance the following note, "Await me at dawn" is delivered to Helen.

The next morning, Olaf leaves a note on Hassen's table telling him of his elopement with Helen and that they are on their way to London. Hassen arrives a few minutes later, and after reading the note decides to follow. Olaf goes to the window of Helen's room, and urges her to hurry and dress. Hassen jumps on their auto from behind, and rides there until they come to the road. He leaves their car and engages another to follow them. Helen and Olaf discover someone is following, and instruct their chauffeur to drive at full speed. At a curve, the car is thrown over with terrific force. The door opens from the sudden jar and the occupants are thrown down a steep embankment.

In the meantime Herbert has returned from his business trip and is at the Deleron home. He is elated over his success and wants to name the date of his marriage to Helen. The door suddenly opens and Ruth, preceded by the butler, rushes in. She tells the banker that his daughter has eloped with Olaf. The telephone rings and no sooner has Mr. Deleron taken up the receiver than his expression changes to untold horror. He is informed of the terrible accident that has happened and his daughter is one of the victims. Mr. Deleron, Herbert, and the butler hurry to the scene of the accident. They arrive too late—the spirit of Helen is passing to the Great Beyond. In this moment of distress, Deleron hears a voice from behind. He turns and beholds Hassen. "This," said Hassen, pointing to the body of Olaf which has been ignored, "is the son I robbed you of, and I now return him—a corpse." Pulling Ruth after him, Hassen and the girl jump into the auto and leave.

Herbert understands everything, and is determined that this demon shall not go unpunished. Herbert and the butler go in pursuit. Hassen, seeing the pursuers are gaining on them, jumps from his automobile and hides behind a tree until the other car passes. Hassen's car is caught up with and in the exciting chase, Herbert jumps from his car onto the other and forces the chauffeur to stop. He only finds Ruth in the car, who refuses to tell anything of Hassen. Her captors take her to Hassen's apartments, and while Herbert and the butler are questioning her, Hassen sneaks up and covering the two men with a revolver, ties them. The East Indian and Ruth escape by the rear of the building over housetops and roofs. Presently, Mr. Deleron arrives and finding Herbert and the butler tied, releases them. The three start on the hunt for Hassen.

Hassen and Ruth, escaping, quarrel and in going up a flight of stairs, tussle. The force of the tussle breaks the banisters and they fall down the stairs to their fate.

THE THREE MUSKETEERS (Six Parts).—Cardinal Richelieu, for political reasons an enemy of the Queen, desires her downfall. He decoys Buckingham, of whom the King is jealous, to Paris by means of a forged letter. D'Artagnan leaves for Paris to enter the King's service. His father gives him a letter to De Treville and bids him "Honor the King, obey Capt. De Treville and never refuse to fight." Poorly dressed, and riding on an old spavined white horse, D'Artagnan arrives at the Black Raven Inn, near Calais. He is insulted and jeered at, resenting which, he is beaten insensible and robbed of his letter by De Rochefort. Regaining consciousness he learns of his loss and starts in pursuit of the thief.

The Cardinal issues an edict prohibiting duelling and gambling in public places. Bonifacе finds six Musketeers gambling in his tavern. He notifies the Guards, who surprise the Musketeers, kill three, wound Athos, and arrest Aramis and Porthos. Reaching the street, Porthos overpowers his captors and rescues Aramis. The Queen learning that Buckingham is in Paris, consents to see him secretly for the last time. Constance delivers the message. Bonifacе, her husband, observes this and reports the matter to Richelieu, who sets Lady De Winter to watch the Queen.

D'Artagnan's first day in Paris is eventful. He manages to offend Athos, Aramis and Porthos and has three duels on his hands. The Three Musketeers are surprised to find they are all to fight the same man. D'Artagnan and Athos start to fight, but are interrupted by Capt. Jussac and four other Cardinal's Guards, who demand that all surrender their swords. The Three Musketeers cry: "Come and take them!" D'Artagnan sides with the Musketeers, quickly disposes of his adversary and saves Athos from being run through by Jussac, whom he disarms. Astounded by D'Artagnan's courage and swordsmanship, the victorious Musketeers welcome him as a comrade and with swords crossed pledge themselves: "One for all land all for one."

The King has quarreled with the Queen. Desiring a reconciliation, he presents her with twelve diamond studs. Buckingham is admitted to the Queen's presence by means of a secret passage. Lady DeWinter, unobserved, witnesses the clandestine meeting. She informs the Cardinal and he in triumph tells the King that Buckingham is with the Queen. The King proceeds to the Queen's apartment, but Constance warns her of his approach. Buckingham begs for a token and is given the first object at hand, the diamond studs. The King arrives to find the bird has flown. Search is made without result and the King after threatening the Queen with the block, orders Richelieu to search the Queen's apartment and even her person if necessary. The search results in the Cardinal taking from the Queen's person an unaddressed letter. Richelieu hastens to the King and hands him the letter, but the King's rage is turned to laughter when he finds it is the Queen's brother, the Emperor of Germany, demanding Richelieu's dismissal. Defeated but not beaten, the Cardinal plots again, and dispatches Lady De Winter to London to steal two of the studs. The King, at Richelieu's suggestion, decides to give a state ball, and requests the Queen to wear the studs. The Queen, in despair, seeks Constance's aid, and she promises that her husband, Bonifacе, will take a message to Buckingham in London and bring back the jewels.

Bonifacе not only refuses to be the Queen's messenger, but tells Constance that he is in the Cardinal's pay and suggests she give him the Queen's letter, so that he may obtain further reward. His request denied, he attempts force, but is frustrated by D'Artagnan. Bonifacе foiled, informs the Cardinal, who sends two of his guards to arrest Constance. D'Artagnan, not knowing Constance is Bonifacе's wife, is smitten by her charms, but Athos discourages him and tells him of his experience with women. Years before he had married Lady De Winter, then under another name, and by chance discovered she was a branded felon and hung her for deceiving him. Unknown to him, she had been rescued. The Cardinal's Guards attempt to arrest Constance, but D'Artagnan and Athos rescue her. Bonifacе being killed in the fight. D'Artagnan and Constance seek De Treville's advice, and he dispatches D'Artagnan to England with the Queen's message, ordering the Three Musketeers to accompany him and see to his safety. At parting Constance gives D'Artagnan a cross she has worn since an infant. Richelieu, learning of the plans, sends De Rochefort to Calais with orders to prevent D'Artagnan leaving England. coast, D'Artagnan and the Three Musketeers are waylaid by a large force of armed men, who overcome the Musketeers, but D'Artagnan makes his escape.

De Rochefort reaches Calais shortly after Buckingham has gone on board his ship, and the Port Warden, obeying the Cardinal's orders, has the portcullis lowered. Lady De Winter, provided with the Cardinal's passport, is aided to board Buckingham's ship. The Duke recognizes her as his divorced wife. D'Artagnan arrives, and is refused passage by the Port Warden, but binds and gags him and makes his escape in an open boat. He is fired upon and wounded by the Guards, led by the Port Warden, who has been released by De Rochefort. D'Artagnan reaches Buckingham's ship, and while the Duke is on deck interviewing D'Artagnan, Lady De Winter steals two of the studs. Returning to the cabin with D'Artagnan, Buckingham becomes suspicious and accuses him of being Milady's accomplice, and orders her put ashore. D'Artagnan produces the Queen's letter and swears by the cross Constance had given him that he is a friend. Buckingham recognizing the cross exclaims: "The woman who gave you that cross is my daughter!" Giving D'Artagnan the diamonds, the Duke discovers that two of the studs are missing, and decides Lady De Winter has taken them. To avoid capture, D'Artagnan decides to swim ashore. He dives through the porthole and eventually lands on a wild part of the coast. Seeking shelter at a tavern, D'Artagnan's gold arouses the cupidity of the landlord, who shoots and robs him and flings his body into the cellar.

Lady De Winter returns to Paris sooner than expected and delivers the studs to the Cardinal. Believing D'Artagnan safe in England, the Cardinal influences the King to hold the ball two days earlier. The day of the ball arrives, with no news of D'Artagnan and the Queen are in despair. Endless crowds of courtiers and ladies are seen descending the grand staircase and a gavotte is in progress when the heralds announce the approach of the King and Queen. The stately procession enters and the King is about to lead the Queen to the dance, when the Cardinal calls attention to the fact that the Queen is not wearing the studs. The King insists that she wear them; the Queen returns to her apartment, where Constance offers to sacrifice herself by saying she had stolen the diamonds. D'Artagnan's opportune return with the studs saves the day. The Queen returns to the ballroom, while D'Artagnan tells Constance that the Duke of Buckingham is her father and receives his greatest reward—herself. The King shows pleasure at the sight of the studs, but the wily Cardinal suggests he count them, and finding there are only ten, asks where the other two are. Lady De Winter produces them and tells the King how she obtained them. At this climax Athos recognizes Lady De Winter, and proclaiming her a thief, forces her to her knees, tears away her dress, exposing to the horror of all the brand of the felon. Her arrest is ordered despite her vain appeals to the Cardinal. The King realizing the conspiracy, banishes the Cardinal, and after asking her pardon, leads the Queen to the dance.

THE NIGHT RIDERS OF PETERSHAM (Three Parts—Vitagraph).—Richard arrives at Petersham to claim his inheritance papers from his guardian and uncle, J. B. Coke, Petersham's leading citizen. He meets Emily Burnay and learns that her father, the editor of the local paper, has many enemies on account of declaring that some of Petersham's prominent residents run an illicit still in the hills. Coke has confiscated Richard's securities and plans to conceal the fact. Richard and Burnay become friends and when the editor is warned to beware of the "Night Riders," Richard decides to stand by his friend. One night Coke steals a box supposed to contain Richard's securities. Richard stabs at him, misses him and cuts off a piece of Coke's sleeve. Coke escapes and Richard goes downstairs, awakens his uncle, who is feigning asleep, and tells him of the occurrence.

Burnay is again warned by the "Night Riders." Emily and Richard, now lovers, gain the everlasting gratitude of Job Trainor, the village blacksmith, by caring for his little daughter when she is injured. The "Night Riders" capture Elmer, the editor's son and he recognizes among them a well-known citizen. They bind him and set him adrift on a raft. Richard discovers the boy's plight and rescues him. Bringing him to Burnays office, Richard finds the "Riders" have left a note, threatening to burn the place if another edition of the paper is published. Burnay declares his intention of getting out the next one in spite of their threats.

The edition is printed and Richard distributes it. Emily asks Job's assistance and he gets together several friends, all fully armed, bringing them to Burnay's house at night. "The Night Riders," masked in long hoods, and led by Coke, ride up and demand that Burnay give up his press. On being refused, they start to fire the building. Burnay and his men then rush out and after a terrific fight, drive the "Riders" into full retreat. Coke and Richard grapple. The former's mask is torn off and he is about to shoot the astonished Richard when Job grasps his wrists. Later, Richard finds his uncle packing up the dagger-ripped coat. Coke then confesses and telling Richard the estate is now his, departs forever. Richard, tired out, sinks in a chair and dreams of what we all naturally anticipate: his happy marriage to Emily.

LOST IN MID-OCEAN (Three Parts—Vitagraph).—At the Embassy Ball, Leona, daughter of Mr. Bryce, meets Tagisha, a wealthy Japanese. He becomes infatuated with her, but she refuses his advances. Mr. Bryce dies from grief and worry over financial troubles and Tagisha employs a spy to follow Leona, who, left destitute, becomes a model for Richard Manley, an artist. Later, she marries the artist and they go on their honeymoon to Japan, visiting Richard's friend, Harold Marsden, Consul to Tokio. Tagisha, after an unsuccessful attempt to stab Richard, follows them to Japan. As they are about to return to America on the steamer "Americus," Tagisha, by a clever ruse, succeeds in kidnapping Leona. Her husband does not miss Leona, supposing her to be in their stateroom.

Leona, although carefully guarded by Tagisha's spy, finally attracts the attention of a Japanese boy, throws him a Japanese coat given her by Harold, with a note appealing to whoever finds it, to direct the boy to the steamer "Americus." The boy arrives after the steamer has sailed. Harold sees him with the coat, reads the note, and after a terrific struggle with Tagisha, who is killed, he succeeds in rescuing Leona. Leona sails on the following day aboard "The Mikado"; Harold sending Richard—on the "Americus"—a wireless to that effect. "The Mikado" strikes an iceberg and is wrecked with a loss of many lives. "The Americus" receives a wireless call for help from the sinking steamer and goes to the rescue. Richard knowing Leona is on that steamer, is nearly frantic. "The Americus" arrives in time to rescue some of the "Mikado's passengers. Leona is missing and her husband is grief-stricken. Holding to a piece of wreckage, she is picked up by a Japanese fisherman and brought back to Japan, where she notifies Harold of her safety. He sends word to Richard, but he has left his old haunts, believing Leona dead. Leona returns to America, but cannot locate her husband. He has become a recluse. After six years he comes back and sees in the paper an account of a strange woman risking her life to save a picture painted by him. He decides to visit the hospital where she has been taken and there Leona and he meet, face to face. After the first shock and their recognition, they are soon clasped in each other's embrace.

KIMBLE MOTORS

Better Service at Less Cost

KIMBLE
Alternating Current VENTILATING FANS

You get better service because—

Kimble Fans are variable speed. You can run them at any speed to suit the size of each audience. The chain controls the speed.

Kimble Fans are reversible. You can change them instantly from intake to exhaust by pulling the chain. You can use the one fan to force out foul air and then to draw in fresh air.

You pay less because—

Kimble Fans reduce current consumption in direct proportion to every speed reduction. At half speed they use up only half as much current as at full speed. At quarter speed they use only a quarter the current—and so on.

Kimble Fans are the only variable speed, reversible, alternating current fans that reduce current consumption in proportion to reduction in speed.

Give your house the name of the "fresh air" movie by giving the best ventilation. Save yourself money on ventilation. Install a Kimble Fan.

You will get complete and interesting facts from our Red Catalogue. Write for your copy.

What Your Eyes See You Can Believe

$1,000.00 that we can substantiate every claim we make $1,000.00 open to any manufacturer of screens on earth. This ad has been published for weeks. Surely seeing is believing. Will any screen manufacturer on earth give you a bonafide guarantee against oxidation, cracking, or peeling, for five years?

NO! NO! NO! They Don't Dare To!

MIRRORROIDE is on the market for over five years. We have installed to date 7,008 screens. More than the combined output of all others.

is made in silver white, silver flesh, pale gold, as to your requirements and desires in two surface finishes. B—heavy matte, for extra wide theatres. A—for theatres under 25 feet in width.

Gentlemen:
I am enclosing order for one MIRRORROIDE Screen, 12 x 15, to be shipped to C. B. Dunkle, Art Theatre, 1224 Sycamore St., Buffalo, N. Y.
I installed one of your MIRRORROIDE Screens in Imp Theatre, Uniontown, Pa., in 1911, and was more than pleased. I remain
Yours Respectfully,

The J. H. Genter Co., March 18, 1914.
Newburgh, N. Y.
Gentlemen:
While perusing the columns of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD this week, I noticed what Mr. George Morgan, of the Morgan Theatre, Auburn, N. Y., had to say in regard to his MIRRORROIDE curtain. I can heartily endorse Mr. Morgan's sentiments.
About a year ago I purchased a large MIRRORROIDE curtain of the Auburn Film Co. of Auburn, N. Y., who recommended it very highly, and I can truthfully state that the results are wonderful.
I was requested by Mr. F. W. Spreter of the Auburn Film Company, to install MIRRORROIDE, and not to spend so much money on a screen as the MIRRORROIDE could be bought at a hundred per cent. less and would give the same results, and I congratulate myself upon taking this gentleman's advice.
My theatre has a seating capacity of 500 and it was my aim when erecting this theatre to make it one of the most gorgeous for its size in the city of Syracuse, coupled with the latest and best equipment that money could buy.
I have two Fort Wayne Motor Generators, two Powers No. 6-A Cameragraph motors driven together with a MIRRORROIDE curtain, and believe I have one of the best equipments any exhibitor could install.
Before closing I wish to assure you that I cannot recommend your curtain any too highly.
Respectfully yours,
THEODORE E. PENNOCK.

Is this not proof? Look over the columns of MOVING PICTURE WORLD as far back as you please. Read the testimonial endorsements on screens. What screen leads?

"IMAR THE SERVITOR"

brought out two all-important things:

MAJESTIC opposes PADDING
MAJESTIC opposes CHEAP SENSATIONALISM

New Majestic's "death-to-padding" stand leaves no room for misunderstanding on OUR attitude toward feature-padding, an evil that we maintain is all too prevalent to-day. New Majestic's recent shots at the "unknown, cheap, trashy, bunk feature" show WE don't do THAT KIND! We proved our "padding" stand when we clipped three thousand feet from "Imar the Servitor." We proved our "cheap feature" stand when we had no less than Daniel Carson Goodman WRITE the play, and a terribly popular player like William Garwood take the title role, augmenting all this with a huge cast of other known players and lavish sets. Four reels. See a Continental or Mutual office QUICK!

On the regular program is a two-reeler called "The Hunchback," out Sunday, April 12th, that is drama of a new kind. The heart interest is simply unsurpassed! Tuesday, April 14th, the release is "His Punishment," one of those present-day, real-life storiettes in which Majestic excels.

THE WORLD'S EXPOSITION

TO be held at San Francisco, California, in nineteen hundred and fifteen, will be a wonderful tribute to this city.

THIS signal honor has been conferred in recognition of the indomitable will and responsive spirit displayed in a time of adversity by the City of the Golden Gate, and which has made it recognized as one of the leading cities of the world.

THIS active spirit is evidenced by its beautiful parks, buildings and many places of amusement, chief of which are Motion Picture Theatres.

IT may be interesting to note that out of ninety-five motion picture projecting machines counted in these theatres, eighty of them are of Power's manufacture.

From C. J. Hite

President Thanhouser Film Corporation

New Rochelle, N. Y.

C. J. HITE, President

To the Exhibitors of America:

Our recent announcement of the coming of the stupendous production, "The Million Dollar Mystery," has so overwhelmed us with inquiries from exhibitors that I take this means of notifying theatre managers everywhere that arrangements have been perfected for releasing even a greater number of reels than originally planned—I hope sufficient to take care of the tremendous demand.

The producing of "The Million Dollar Mystery" is, by far, the greatest task ever undertaken by any film manufacturer. You have, no doubt, heard that the Chicago Tribune and 200 other leading newspapers will print this remarkable story by Harold MacGrath (scenario by Lloyd Lonergan) simultaneously with its appearance in the theatres and that a capital prize of $10,000.00 in cash will be paid for the best solution of this mystery. "The Million Dollar Mystery" will succeed the Kathlyn Series. It will appear in the newspapers in weekly installments starting June 28th. First release, June 29th.

This announcement is made to assure exhibitors that we are using all our tremendous resources to supply every theatre manager who has applied for these films and to make "The Million Dollar Mystery" the most successful motion-picture production that ever has been brought out.

Truly yours,

Gentlemen:--

'A Princess of Bagdad' was shown yesterday at the Grand Theatre, this city, at twenty five cents admission to capacity business all day despite adverse weather conditions. After the performance this Feature was booked into all eight of the Montgomery Amusement Company theatres, the Grand here being one of this chain.

We are receiving requests for bookings from various cities in this territory, we already have many days taken and our two road men are adding bookings rapidly.

'A Princess of Bagdad' is different in so many ways from most so-called Features that we are much pleased with same and it has been our pleasure to hear only favorable comment from those who witnessed yesterday's performances. We expect most gratifying result's from this Feature.

Very truly yours,

Facts and Comments

THE head of a great firm of film producers, speaking recently about the general tendency to make motion pictures the objects of special legislation, and referring in particular to the censorship question, remarked that the prosperity of the producers and exhibitors was at the bottom of all this hostile agitation. He expressed the belief that it was very largely the old process of taking political toll of a new and rich industry. This is no doubt the sentiment all through filmdom, and no reasonable man will deny that it is founded on fact. The men looking for graft follow the lines of least resistance, and the lack of concord between the different branches of our industry has greatly diminished our power of resistance.

There is room in the industry to-day for a great representative body composed of what is best and strongest in every branch. Such a body would have some weight behind it and would have to be reckoned with by the lawgivers everywhere. We have no such body in this country at the present time. In the early days of the industry when the distributor had the preponderance of power, we had an organization of distributors, later we had strong organizations of producers and still more recently we have had organizations of exhibitors. Each of these organizations has proceeded on the theory that it owed allegiance simply to its own group, and if there was any feeling of solidarity and community of interest between them it has never manifested itself in any practical manner. With the enemies of the motion picture always firmly united it is time that the various branches of the industry co-operate on all matters touching the common interest. No one branch of the industry can be prosperous for any length of time at the expense of another branch, and the interest of one is truly the concern of all. The dangers which best the industry beset every single branch of it. This fact has long ago been recognized in a most practical way in England and in France. Both of these countries have such motion picture parliaments in which every interest within the industry has its voice. Both in England and in France these organizations are well known and highly respected. In France their annual social affairs are attended by representatives of the highest governmental circles and by men and women well known in the world of education, in the field of literature and in the domain of the drama. The motion picture in this country has reached a high plane, the men associated with it are the equals, to say the least, of any of the cognate arts or industries, and there is no reason in the world why we should lag behind the older countries in creating a powerful and representative organization of the motion picture interests in the United States.

A VALUED correspondent writes to us from a city in Ohio: "Why exchanges encourage vaudeville houses to put on long programs on Sunday, thereby killing the small picture houses, is a matter that is hard to fathom. It is one of the big problems the exchange and the manufacturer have to solve. We know of a house seating 1800 that is showing an eight-reel program daily for five and ten cents. The theater goes into burlesque next season. How many little fellows will be put out of business in the meantime?" Unfortunately, the situation described by our correspondent is by no means confined to Ohio, but is almost typical of many exchanges. As our friend puts out in apt phrase, "this is killing the goose that lays the golden eggs."

THERE is a form of competition not amenable to the law, but wholly objectionable in the forum of fair dealing. We are referring to men who seek to take advantage of the other man's advertising. A play of great merit upon which much care and talent and money has been spent is widely advertised, partly through the columns of the press and partly through its own intrinsic excellence. Along comes some man who is unable to originate anything himself and appropriates the name of the successful play or advertises a woefully inferior production under a name very similar to that of the meritorious films. One cannot help looking upon such men and all their kind as parasites who, utterly incapable themselves, feed upon the brains and the enterprise of others.

THE proprietor of a motion picture theater in this city fitted out an imitation of the electric chair in Sing Sing, and placing a man in it he had a "barker" call attention to the spectacle and urging people to come inside. A crowd collected and the proprietor or manager of the place was arrested for disorderly conduct. Such practices by exhibitors of motion pictures cannot be condemned too severely. We doubt whether half a dozen men in the business could be found willing to stoop so low; but, of course, even one is enough to harm the whole industry. We hope he will be dealt with to the utmost limit of the law.

National Traits in Films

By W. Stephen Bush

BY THIS time we know our brothers across the big pond as well as our next-door neighbors. We know "English Traits" better than we could learn them from Emerson, we have become intimate with the countrymen of Hans Breitmann, we are most familiar with our friends in France and nothing is hidden from us in the character and the habits of our contemporaries in sunny Italy. It is all due to the motion picture. A boy or girl of fifteen, a regular patron of the motion picture theater, can to-day sit down and write a fair sort of essay on Europe and her nations.

We have all laughed at the follies and foibles of the transatlantic world so strikingly revealed on the screen.

I watched an Italian picture recently that was just one gorgeous dream of revenge. There is nothing more persistent than an Italian lady or gentleman in search of good dramatic revenge. In Naples and Sicily especially, children cry for it. It is offered as a wedding present to the bride and as a consolation to old age. There are intricacies of Italian revenge which we ruder children of the North are wholly unable to follow. I made an attempt to follow the course of revenge, or rather revenges, in the film I saw the other day. In the first reel a brother revenged his sister, in the second reel there were two or three working revenges, while in the third everybody was revenging himself on general principles. The worst of it is there never seems to be any final revenge. Along toward the end of the second reel we heartily wish there might be some sort of a friendly settlement, but there never is. At the end the survivors are as thirsty for revenge as ever. It is a splendid thing for the Italian scenario writers. It simplifies their labors. Theirs is merely the task of finding the best and strongest kind of revenge, and the best and strongest revenge is always the oldest. Italians lay little store by a new, fresh revenge. A revenge which is not at least fifty years old might as well be left on the shelf or delivered over to beginners to practice with. Next to its age, the greatest merit of the revenge is its complicatedness. If you want to write for the Italian market you might as well understand that a plain, simple or garden variety of revenge is an object of contempt among experienced writers. If you cannot involve everybody, from the babies in arms up, you might as well not try.

Next to revenge, and, indeed, its faithful concomitant in the Italian film, is the trap-door. A friend of mine with a statistical turn of mind, after carefully watching a large number of Italian films, figures that there is a well-sustained average of two trap-doors to a reel. In a weird film of probably Neapolitan origin, no less than eighteen trap-doors were counted in two reels, and in one phase of the development of the plot the heroine dropped through four trap-doors, consistently pursued by the villain.

In happy contrast to this feverish and insatiable desire for high-class and refined revenge is the German film, of which recently we see a good deal. The dominating desire of the German director is not to alarm his audience unduly. He may be the most daring and reckless fellow in the world, but he must stay within the speed limit. Heroes and heroines and villains are supposed to temper their rashness with care. They may step up to the edge of the precipice and (in the titles) threaten to jump down, but they must be careful at the same time. In accidents a desire for intense realism is always modified by a due regard for the personal comfort and safety of the performers. I have seen auto accidents in German films where everything went to smash and the hero and the heroine lay lifeless on the ground, but were unable to suppress a little smile of gratification at the perfect arrangements that had been made for their safety. I have seen another auto disaster in which it was thought sufficient to show a minor defect in the tire. The chauffeur repaired the defect smiling genially at the camera man, probably to reassure the director that he had not been hurt in the least. Even in the most horrible explosions and the most frightful collisions the principal performers make it clear to the audience that, however badly they may seem to have been injured for the sake of lending realism to the picture, they are in sober truth in the best of health and full of good humor and appetite.

The directors and actors in German films are not only required to refrain from alarming their audience, but they must be equally careful not to deceive their audiences too long. It is one of the cast-iron rules of the German film melodrama that the disguised detective must remove his disguise in full view of the audience as soon as he has done his trick. His failure to do so would leave a portion at least of the audience in doubt and confusion. The Germans love nothing better for a suitable background and atmosphere than a nice cemetery, the rural cemetery always preferred. They like to show well-kept graves and good, respectable tombstones. Next to these in degree of popularity are death scenes and nice, orderly funeral processions. These scenes are wholesome checks on any excess of swiftness in the action and a distinct rebuke to ultra-sensationalism in films. Action in some of these German-made films does not really begin until the start of the third reel, and by that time the audience which still holds out is generally asleep.

Have you ever known of a good, loyal, faithful, home-loving husband or wife in the French films? Yes, there may be exceptions, but as a rule the damage to conjugal fidelity in the films of our Gallic brethren is out of all proportion. No doubt they have honeymoons there, but it is not long before the tie that binds begins to chafe and a perfect carnival of wickedness follows. They make light of these matrimonial faux pas in the French films, and show a lack of irresponsibility which we Anglo-Saxons find it difficult to understand even in children. Except in rare cases the matter never gets serious enough for the invocation of the divorce courts; the weeping wife or husband either returns in repentance or both sides to the bargain laugh the incident out of their lives. They are, in the films at least, such light-hearted, unsophisticated creatures that it is hard to quarrel with them. They are not popular with censor boards. Another marked peculiarity of the French film is the detail of the meals at home. The family starting in on their soup is a familiar sight, and may be the prelude to anything—either a comedy or a tragedy or a fine hand-colored biblical story. Old-timers must remember the dear old French policemen in the early Pathe films, always traveling in pairs, always waxing their moustachios, always pompous and grave and always missing the man they were hunting for.

No doubt we appear quite peculiar from the European point of view, and I think we would thank some friendly critic for helping to see ourselves as others see us.

We suspect right now that they look upon us as a lot of money-kings with seared hearts and no ability to see any thing but the different kinds of currency. Our tipping let us hope has made some impression upon its multitudinous beneficiaries for in Europe they trail Americans by their ability to assuage the itch of the palm.

Production Without Method

By Louis Reeves Harrison

MEN who started to make moving pictures many years ago encountered a remarkable condition, one that may still exist to a degree, a demand far in excess of supply and constantly outgrowing it. Among those engaged in releasing filmed stories were some of natural qualifications for the business, and they are generally credited with whatever progress has been made in quality of production, but there were others who profited for no other perceptible reason than the existence of popular requirements more active than discriminating. Business has been constantly increasing in volume and has been so profitable in many instances that method and organization have been largely factorial and political. System has been applied to purely mechanical departments, to selling and to publicity schemes, and there has been economy shown in the purchase of supplies, but there has been, and still is, plenty of room for improvement in the actual visualization of stories and plays.

I do not mean to say that salaries have been too high —they have been too low in many cases, but there has been a painful lack of judgment shown in the selection of subjects for treatment, though that is the basis on which all production must eventually stand, and that one failing causes a tremendous waste of time and labor in the studios. It is becoming gradually known that superior plays cost no more than poor ones to produce, that they bring double profits, and that, if they are planned with system and intelligence, their actual cost is far below patched-up revivals of what has already done time. It is more astonishing to find that old methods of taking in excess of requirements, trimming down and editing to suit the remaining scenes still prevail in some studios.

Not pretending to be an efficiency expert, I would not call direct attention to weaknesses observed in this or that studio. It might be resented on the spot. But I may be justified in remarking false methods which have repeatedly been shown, and those who read may profit or not according to their own free will. My sole idea is to present the cases coming constantly to notice, with such offhand suggestions for betterment as may arise.

"Taking over" a scene, photographing it a second time, may not be regarded as a material addition to the general cost of a production in which the gross profit is large, particularly if the scene is "taken over" at once to eliminate mistakes not discovered the first time. There is a material addition to cost in time, labor, lights and film, but we will leave such instances unconsidered. They represent only a small loss from lack of system, or they may even occur because no human being is infallible. How about "taking over" after the negative film has been developed and projected on the screen in private exhibition?

A flood of answers may follow such a question, but the fact is that many productions of two or more reels are so systematized at the beginning that only those scenes are taken a second time which closely follow a first one in which an accident has occurred. Further than that, all scenes have been so accurately timed in advance that economic precision is observed in the amount of film used. This statement will not be a remarkable one to some producers—to others it will be unbelievable. I have watched scenes being taken a half-dozen times in succession, "to get them right," only to be photographed again at a later period, and then to be trimmed down more than half in the editing.

Instancing another waste, I recently saw a five-reel feature which the producer informed me had come here from California in 9,000 feet of negative, had been printed in 9,000 feet of positive and had been edited to less than 5,000 feet, yet I do not expect that statement to be received with incredulity. Such is the rule rather than the exception. There was certainly a large cost, aside from that of film, in taking the rejected 4,000 feet. Why was it taken? The answer is obvious, when I cite another instance. In another case, the scenes were timed in advance, so that the end of each "act," or reel, contained an element of suspense, due consideration being given to the fact that all exhibitors are not provided with two projectors. There must be tension of interest to hold an audience during the enforced wait.

Each act of a thousand feet was so well timed that little more than that amount of film was used, perhaps an excess of a few hundred feet, in all. This will be incredible to those accustomed to the old system, but, further than that, a systematic arrangement of minor details in advance resulted in so expediting the work of director and actors that time operations were reduced to a minimum and the actual cost of production heavily reduced over any previous and similar work. Furthermore, the feature proved to be an unqualified success.

The cost of publicity where there is merely an old play to sell instead of a really fine play to sell is doubled and even trebled. A feature of unqualified merit, of such powerful appeal as to immediately interest prospective buyers, becomes its own salesman. Instead of wasting money on production without method and with consequent extravagant publicity, it is better policy to get a story with which the whole audience, or a large part of it, is not familiar, to pay for interpreters of ability and personality, to give consideration to beauty of scene, and to produce something worth while.

Large buyers are guided by quality more than ever before, and they are becoming more and more discriminating in making their purchases. They are giving preference to stories of inherent merit rather than those attempting to reflect or imitate what has appeared in some other form. They have sound and intelligent reasons for selecting what responds to the tastes and feelings of present-day people, and, whether or not they know exactly what the people want, they are being guided by high standards occasionally set by the finest producers at home and abroad. Shrewd buyers are noting what succeeds, and that is certainly one way of approaching a solution of the popular demand.

The one way not to succeed in making this new method of thought transference superior to literature and the drama is to copy the faults of the older arts. As a business institution, the production of moving pictures involves, as does the novel and the stage play, supplying what the public wants. Because of its direct methods of communication, appealing straight to the heart and to the mind without verbal intervention, because of its broader outlook and its distributive facilities, the new art is bound to grow, but its natural growth will be entirely its own, and the fruits of its tremendous success will go to those who produce with method what trained judgment deems worth producing.

The best examples of modern photodrama will deal with vital phases of the struggle now going on in politics and society, symbolizing the growing world-spirit all about us.

Two Striking Apexes.

"Should a Woman Tell?" a Problem Play, and "The Queen of the Forty Thieves," Both in Four Parts.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE public will look upon this feature as a successful effort to film an ever interesting problem play. The producers do not attempt to give an answer to their own question, "Should a Woman Tell?" but they will make every audience interest itself in the question. The dominant note in this feature is purely tragic, awakening the sense of pity and terror and showing how human creatures are often hurried to destruction by unfathomable destiny.

The leading part is taken by an accomplished actress of the Imperial Theater at St. Petersburg. She portrays the young noblewoman, who tires of the emptiness of social life and social gaiety and seeks to make herself useful by helping the poor. On one of her errands of mercy she meets a young carpenter who has been hurt while at work. He is a depraved and worthless fellow and playing upon the human sympathy of the countess, he lures her in a most ingenious manner to his wretched lodging. The countess enters and at once addresses herself to the ministrations of charity, when the object of her mercy throws off the mask of humility and gives full vent to his evil passions. Unable to reach help, the countess must succumb to her ravisher. The situation is extremely delicate, but it is portrayed in a way which bares it of all suggestiveness and makes the spectator understand and appreciate at once that it is shown not for the sake of elaborating a terrible situation, but as a logical and unavoidable part of the drama.

The countess stung into a frenzy of shame and mortification by the outrage, avenges herself on her assailant and escapes. The recollection of her terrible misfortune haunts her and she is in danger of becoming morbid and falls into a serious illness. Recovering from her illness, she seems at last to have exercised the evil memory and accepts the proposal of a young nobleman to make her his wife. On the eve of her wedding she sends a letter containing an account of the unfortunate day in her life, but it does not reach him and the marriage is consummated without any revelations on the part of the wife. Soon after the marriage her dreadful secret begins to oppress her once more and she seeks relief by telling her husband of the awful misfortune which had befallen her. The husband flies into a fury and though she is guiltless, he refuses to absolve her from guilt, while she with offended pride, leaves his roof. In vain does the husband seek relief from the bitter memories of his marriage by indulging in pleasure. The vision of his wife comes back to him constantly. Through an accident he finds that she has become an actress of some reputation. He rushes to her dressing room offering his heart to her and pleading forgiveness for his cruel course, but she tells him whatever love she may have felt for him has been killed by his unreasoning attitude. The husband dies in despair.

Even this brief description of the plot will make it plain that much of the success of this tragedy must depend on the personality and histrionic powers of the artistic who takes the part of the unfortunate wife. The Russian actress acquits herself in a most capable manner and no fault can be found with her rendition of this most hazardous and difficult part. The acting of the other members is uniformly good and the settings, distinctly and really Russian throughout, possess the great charm of novelty.

Here and there the writer of the scenario departs from the simple and direct line of dramatic action and adds scenes and episodes which are not essential to the progress of the action. To me, however, it seemed as if these departures were entirely justified because they give us interesting glimpses into Russian life and conditions. It is one of the privileges of a photodrama that it may, to a limited extent, digress for the sake of depicting conditions and episodes though they may not be absolutely essential to the understanding of the drama.

The last scene showing the death of the count by his own hand is objectionable and can easily be eliminated without the slightest injury to the completeness of the drama.

"Queen of the Forty Thieves"—In Four Parts.

This excellent feature deserves a better name and I am at a loss to understand the appropriateness of the title, which does not arise out of any prominent part of the film.

The production is sensational, but sensational in the best sense of the word, it provides a shower of thrills; it has a good strong climax, which in the film jargon of the present day is described as a "punch." It is plain that there has been a lavish expenditure of money in staging the production and both the daring and the spectacular have been emphasized all the way through.

The story tells of an attempt of a lawless band to abduct a millionaire's daughter and hold her for ransom. The lawless band mysteriously garbed, and all provided with excellent horses, waylay the millionaire and his daughter, seize her and carry her off to their den. A stalwart, handsome young man of striking appearance is the hero of the play and he rivals one of the major villains as an expert roof climber and high jumper. Around this somewhat threadbare plot, the producers have woven a series of most exciting and generally original scenes, including a most realistic fire and an equally realistic rescue.

The tinting and photography of this feature are superb. The settings have been selected with particular care and taste and the acting leaves little to be desired.

"Seeds of Chaos" (Essanay)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

UNSTINTED praise is due Essanay's "Seeds of Chaos," a two-part subject, booked for release on May 1st. This statement is made after a careful weighing of the merits of the scenario and of the production generally.

It will be difficult to recall a single spot where the story lags in interest, or one where the meaning is obscure. Director Harry McRae Webster has looked well after the latter point, and he has given a production throughout that can be referred to as a model in many respects. Especially is he painstaking in matters of detail—even the most minute. We have had many courtroom scenes in photodramatic work, but I cannot bring to mind one that embodies the realism of that in "Seeds of Chaos." The dignified judge, the rapid thrust and parry of opposing counsel, the pallid prisoner at the bar, the jury with tense faces as they observe the swiftly-changing aspects of the case, the bailiff as he enforces strict order, the kaleidoscopic sea of faces in the room outside the bench, the wife of the prisoner with their child in her arms standing in a prominent place where a sight of them nerves and comforts him, the voluntary confession of the real criminal before the court, and his desertion by counsel, who shows by his manner that he was willing to sacrifice an innocent man in order that he might win his case—all contribute to an intensely moving scene that holds the spectator with the grip of a vice. And the same care has been bestowed on the other scenes.

The leading character part, Morgan, is in the able charge of Rapley Holmes. This is the first time I have seen Mr. Holmes in moving pictures, although it is not his first essay in photodramatic work. He and Mrs. Holmes are recent acquisitions by the Essanay management. Mr. Holmes is widely known in dramatic circles, having succeeded Macklyn Arbuckle as leading man in "The Round-Up," appearing in the role of Slim Hoover. Mrs. Holmes—down in the cast of "Seeds of Chaos" as Mrs. Booth—was leading lady in "The Round-Up."

As Morgan, of Morgan & Co., Mr. Holmes gives a forceful characterization. He has the art of expressing emotions most convincingly by mobile facial changes, and the camera reveals him at all times in natural poses. In the courtroom scene, with delicate art, he brings out the better traits of Morgan's character in a way that wins one's sympathy, while it lulls the scorn that is ready to surge from the heart.

Richard C. Travers appears to me stronger in the part of Booth, the accused bookkeeper, than in any other character in which I have seen him. The tender home scenes are in strong contrast to his defiant attitude before the man who has planned his ruin. And this is eminently human, for "his strength is as the strength of ten, because his heart is pure." That attitude becomes still more manly when he grasps the hand of the fallen Morgan and cheers the contrite sinner by the words, "You tried to get me, Morgan; but you're a man, sir, in spite of that."

Mrs. Booth, Mrs. Gerda Holmes actually preaches a sermon for the woman disconsolate. There is no whining when the blow comes. The shock is great and it numbs the heart; but it does not bereave the little woman of courage nor faith in her husband. Their love has been too sacred for the entrance of a shadow of doubt in her mind. There is no time for tears, at least not before him. She looks straight in his eyes and strengthens him by brave words of hope and counsel. Then, practical woman that she is, she bows her back for the burden, and goes out to seek work that will keep the wolf from the door, for her child and herself. That picture which shows her standing at the railing that separates the sacred precincts of the bench from non-participants in the proceedings, with her child held high so that papa can see both of them in his great time of stress, will make the tears well from eyes long unused to such weakness.

E. T. Lowe, Jr., one of Essanay's staff of writers, is the author of the scenario. While commending him heartily, the wish is expressed that he will favor us often with stories of equal merit.

In photography and technique the films are of a high standard. John Booth, head bookkeeper for Morgan & Co., works hard and honestly for the firm. His long hours are lightened by the home hours with his wife and little girl.

Richard Morgan, head of the firm, has the very impress of business responsibility and respectability. But he dabbles in stocks and loses heavily. As the result, he draws on the firm's funds and becomes hopelessly involved.

To extricate himself, he forms a plan to implicate Booth and make him the scapegoat. Certain leaves abstracted from the ledger, together with valuable securities, are placed by Morgan in Booth's private desk the night before the yearly auditing begins. The auditor discovers the loss, and Booth is discovered the victim. Officers are summoned and the innocent bookkeeper is sent to prison.

Scene from "Seeds of Chaos" (Essanay).

Morgan still continues to gamble in stocks, and loses heavily. One day, appalled by the losses revealed by the tape, he is seized by brain fever. His physician sees that the only hope of his recovery lies in careful nursing.

John Booth's wife, who has resumed her former vocation of professional nurse, is recommended to attend the stricken man. She is ignorant of his identity, as he is of her's. When convalescent, Morgan is told by his physician that he owes his life to the care of his nurse.

A few days later Morgan learns that his nurse is the wife of the man he has ruined. After a night of mental torture, he decides to confess his guilt before the court where Booth is being tried.

As the filmed story fades out, we see him behind prison bars, smiling and contented over his righting of a horrible wrong.

"THE SECRET SIDE."

A Dissertation on the Inadvisability of Too Much Publicity. Written From the Selig Point of View.

FROM negative results that have accrued in time past, following the write-ups, exposing the secrets of the stage, describing effects in a way that cheapen them, would seem to impress those who should conserve such things with the desirability of keeping busy-bodies out of places where they do not belong. Times without number the big melodramatic sensation of the stage, the clever devices, and the puzzling effects have been started on their way to the scrap-heap by illustrated write-ups, pointing out how simple they were, inferring that people were silly to be deluded by such shallow artifices. The really great coiners of stage-effect, from Boucicault and Daly, to Brady and Belasco, have ever been chary about allowing sensational pens the freedom of their stages on the ground that exploitation of their effects from behind the scenes always inclined to nullify their values.

It would appear the part of wisdom for motion picture producers to take advantage of this precedent, and discourage the constant intrusions of sensationists, who are inclined to have fun with the ways and means of making motion pictures, and describe the interiors of great producing studios and their habitants in a way that would make one believe they were a mild form of mad-house. Although the new art form of motion picture making is still young, volumes of meritricious matter have been written seemingly to establish it upon a flimsy, floating basis of haphazard method, and diaphonous device all calculated to fool, instead of impress the public. From the amount of capital invested, the artistic standing of the people engaged, the effort to engage the best pens to provide material for motion picture plays and the high standardizing of all departments, such cheap and senseless exposes would make it appear a most dangerous thing for a dignified art that desires permanency.

There is a big spice of variety in the life of moving pictures; many things of an amusing side that have a wholesome comedy call for write-up. At the same time there is a big, broad, dignified purpose that should be conserved, and the effects that make moving pictures impressive should be carefully kept secluded if the respect of the public is to be continued. Nearly all the large picture establishments of this country have begun to recognize this fact and are no longer open for the free-lance to rove through, and then spread out a funny expose as the result of his observation. Now that the public press has taken a sincere interest in the making and forwarding of moving pictures, it is to be hoped they will see the serious side of the matter rather than follow up the cheap episodes of faking that glib-tongued sensationists describe with ruinous relish.

UNIQUE THEATER.

By F. H. Richardson.

Glidden, Iowa, a village of a few hundred population, has a theater which perhaps lives up to its name better than any other house in the country. In the daytime it is operated as an ordinary grocery store. The first view was taken just inside the door and shows the theater in use as a store. C. E. Haens, the man in his shirt sleeves conducts the store in the daytime and operates the Power's six at night. His partner, Mr. Linn, stands just ahead of him, and, by the way, Brother Linn ought to be the twin brother of Charley Schneider, of Springfield, Mass. Those two can save money by either one of them having two dozen photos taken and sending the other one-half of them.

A Grocery Store in the Daytime.

A Theater at Night.

Cut No. 2 was taken from the stage. There is approximately 250 people seated and standing. It will be observed that the counters fold back up against the shelves, and the grocery end of it is covered with a canvas screen. In the background is the galvanized iron operating room. According to the picture the front row in this theater cannot be styled "bald-headed row." It strikes the writer that this would not be at all a bad scheme in a small town such as Glidden. By such a plan Brothers Havens and Linn ought to be able to give the Gliddenites a pretty good show, and at the same time make money.

BESIDES a live story of good motive, "The Double Cross," third of a series appearing under the general title of "The Man Who Disappeared," offers opportunity for some interesting character revelations and is remarkable for accuracy of type and strength of presentation. MacDermott and the ladies of the cast fully utilize their dramatic opportunities; Ogle so effaced his striking personality that he is scarcely to be recognized in his admirable work; Tamamoto is a revelation and Etynge lives up to all the requirements of his role. The entire group of interpreters succeed in intensifying a naturally interesting story.

pay for the protection he is receiving by participation in a swindling scheme devised by Lipman, the lawyer. The latter has been advertising in "personal" columns of newspapers that a beautiful young heiress desires to meet a wealthy young farmer of aspirations matrimonial and has netted a victim. The victim offers to show his farm and certification that he has fifteen thousand in cash on deposit in a local bank. John Perriton, "The Man Who Disappeared" and the central figure in the series of adventures, is called upon to act as one of the brothers of Jennie, the supposed heiress, and these two become more or less unwilling parties to the lawyer's criminal scheme. Both are compelled by the pressure of circumstances to visit the young farmer at his home and to draw him on. He is very much taken with the young heiress on the occasion of her visit, in company with her alleged brothers, and a new factor, one not reckoned on in the lawyer's machinations, arises in her unexpected liking for the man who is to be defrauded.

She and John Perriton play their parts at the farm, however, and the farmer is induced to visit her in a city apartment especially equipped for the occasion. The ordeal is a trying one for the girl, now that her better nature is asserting itself under love's influence, and Perriton is only sustained by the fact that the police are after him for murder, but these two come into a gradual sympathy of understanding, and the girl breaks down under a conflict of emotion. She confesses to the young farmer that he is being victimized and that she is a party to the swindle.

The habitual criminals, those of the gang, are waiting outside for her to rob her intended and Perriton is sent with a note, "Cop that coin by 11 o'clock, or we will come after it ourselves." Perriton notes that the girl has yielded to the best promptings of her heart and that the farmer is inclined to forgive her, so he joins forces with them against the gang and effects a daring escape. The end of the story is satisfying and holds interest in the adventures yet to come.

Gail Kane.

GAIL KANE, the co-star of George M. Cohan's present sensational Astor Theater hit, "Seven Keys to Baldpate," who has been rightfully termed the most beautiful woman on Broadway, has been induced to return to the motion picture fold once more, and under the direction of Augustus Thomas and the All Star Feature Corporation, with which concern she made her initial appearance before the motion picture camera in the character of "Bonita" in the recent All Star production of "Arizona." She is now engaged in the visualization of Upton sinclair's powerful story and play, "The Jungle," which is also being produced by the All Star corporation.

Gail Kane.

This announcement comes as a pleasant surprise to supporters and followers of the All Star product, many of whom have expressed not infrequent desires that Miss Kane might be seen in other films to be produced after "Arizona."

Advices from the offices of Cohan and Harris, quite recently, that this popular leading lady has been cast for the stellar role in "The Miracle Man," which that theatrical concern will shortly produce, for the moment dispelled the thought of a possibility of future picture work by Miss Kane, but through the courtesy of her managers, Augustus Thomas has succeeded in securing the services of Miss Kane for the role of "Marija" in "The Jungle," a part exceptionally well suited for her and in which her many admirers will find her cast admirably and prominently.

George Nash, remembered for his splendid performances in Charles Klein's "The Gamblers" and "Officer 666," and who is now co-starring with Olga Petrova at the Booth Theater in the season's hit, "Panthea," will be seen in the character of "Jurgis," the central figure in Mr. Sinclair's great book and play.

Principal interest, however, will center in the appearance of Upton Sinclair, who will personally appear in the prologue of the motion picture production of "The Jungle." Mr. Sinclair is at the present time resting in Bermuda, where he is completing a new book. He will arrive in New York in time to play his part for the camera and then return to Bermuda.

"A Militant Suffragette."

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS is an attractive picture in which the sweet harmonies of the home are vividly contrasted with the strife and turmoil in the life of a militant suffragette. Asta Nielsen portrays the fighter for women's votes and this in itself makes the picture worth while. Asta is nothing if not versatile, she possesses the "verve" and daring which shine to special advantage on the screen, and she displays a more than ordinary lot of it in this production. She holds the center of the stage fifty minutes out of the sixty. Motion picture patrons are used nowadays to seeing splendid photography and the best and most artistic of out-door as well as in-door settings, and there is plenty of all that in these films.

Scene from "The Militant Suffragette" (Pathe).

The first part of the production is devoted to showing the simple, but deep-rooted happiness which pervades the ideal household; the smiling and eager faces of children, the eternal delight of the mother in her offspring and all the thousand strong and tender bonds that make the family the pattern of every perfect society. Nellie (Asta Nielsen), is a fresh, charming damsel, full of fun and life and far removed from the vagaries of political feminism. She falls in love with an unknown man in the most romantic of ways, but instead of being allowed to go on the primrose path of Cupid with her Prince Charming, the exuberant young thing is urged by her father to marry a man whom she does not love. Here are the makings of a suffragette. The girl hears the wild oratory of her older and homelier sisters and presently she joins the window-smashing brigade. She is arrested and put in prison. As she looks particularly pathetic in her prison garb everybody sympathizes with her when she is subjected to forcible feeding. Of course, she becomes a martyr on her release from prison and addresses enthusiastic "Votes-for-Women" gatherings. The battle with the men in Parliament rages hotly and all the batteries of the frenzied feminists concentrate their attack on the leader of the Anti-Suffragette forces in the Cabinet. By a chance some compromising love letters written by the leader of the Antis fall into the hands of the suffragettes and Nellie is sent on a blackmailing mission to the hostile leader. If he does not abandon his resistance to the projects of the militant suffragettes the letters will be published and his ruin brought about. As Nellie is ushered into the presence of the archenemy of the suffragettes she discovers that her lover and the enemy of her cause are one and the same person. The leader rejects the compromise and Nellie is now mean enough to plant a real bomb in his house. The bomb is to go off at midnight and occurs on scheduled time, but Nellie is lucky enough to get her lover away from the point of danger. The lover does not mind a little thing like the wrecking of his rooms and his furniture. Just as the girl is about to be taken into custody he astonishes everybody by proclaiming her as his fiancee. The last scene shows home as the true sphere of woman.

There are faults in this picture. The adventuress and her letters might have been left out. Aside from Asta Nielsen the acting was decidedly un-English for a play supposed to be taken from English life. Asta, herself, is not English, but she might easily be mistaken for an English militant. The development of the plot seemed a bit slow at times though it was quite simple and conventional. Even feigned brutality is offensive in films. It was possible to show poverty and intemperance without any display of brutality.

KALEM PICTURE MAKES HIT.

"From the Manger to the Cross" Plays at Newark Theater For Entire Week With Great Success.

Despite the fact that Holy Week is usually regarded as a bad period for theaters, "From the Manger to the Cross," Kalem's five-part masterpiece based on the life of Jesus, drew capacity business to the Newark Theater, where it was presented twice daily during the week of April 6th.

By the courtesy of the proprietors of the new Strand Theater, New York's newest and largest motion picture theater, S. L. Rothapfel, manager of that theater, had charge of the rehearsals, which were held prior to the initial presentation. A mixed quartette from one of New York's most prominent churches, a nine-piece orchestra and an organ, worked under Mr. Rothapfel's direction.

A special presentation was given on Monday afternoon to the ministers and Sunday-school superintendents of the churches located in Newark and its suburbs. That "From the Manger to the Cross" made a profound impression upon the divines was evident from the comments they made at the conclusion. One of them declared, "This picture should have a greater effect than any sermon ever preached."

The comment of the press was highly favorable. The News declared, "The gulf of time is so bridged as to bring Him and His environment and the people among whom He walked close to us. So vivid is the depiction that the absorbed spectator fancies for the moment that he is an observer of the events as they transpired."

The Evening Star, after a long article in which the production was described, wound up by saying, "To see this production is to pray!" The Morning Star was equally strong in its praise.

Exhibitors in and about Newark attended the presentation during the week and were so impressed with the drawing power of the Kalem production that they have made arrangements to present it at their houses. Many of them, taking a leaf out of the book of the Newark Theater presentation, have announced their intention of surrounding their presentations with effects used at the Newark Theater.

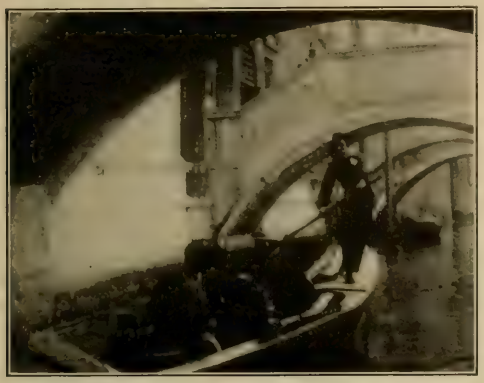
"A Venetian Night."

A Four-Part Production of Quality by Max Reinhardt. Released by the Masko Film Company.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

MAKE room on the index of quality for this Masko feature. The mark of quality is imprinted by the hand of a master. The master in this case is none other than Max Reinhardt, who co-operated in the production of this film with Carl Vollmoeller. The feature has had quite a successful run in London and there is no reason why it should not duplicate its creditable achievements on this side of the water.

The public will like this feature because it gives a most artistic demonstration of the power of the motion picture to visualize a dream. The dream begins in the conventional way of the vision, due to double exposure, and then it carries the spectator along into the vagaries of the dream in such a strangely realistic way that he himself shares in the dream. In other words, the audience experiences the weird sensation of dreaming with the dreamer and of awakening into consciousness just as the dreamer himself shakes off his illusion. Add to this that the stage is set in Venice, aptly called the "City of Beautiful Shadows" and you have a film creation which rises very far indeed above the ordinary.



Scene from "A Venetian Night" (Masko).

There is a delightful blend of humor in this feature. At times it is a humor which lies close to pathos and sadness, at other times it is grotesque and again it approaches the farcical. It is not easy to tell the story because dreams are always hard to describe, but in brief outline it deals with an entertaining series of events as they appeared in a dream to an impressionable young stranger and visitor in Venice. Later it shows the real and daylight development of these same events.

An impressionable young stranger arrives in the "City of Lagoons" and is made a witness to the marriage of a young woman to a man who was not her choice. This latter person, a fat, heavy, rollicking wine merchant, does not seem to know and certainly does not care about the feelings of his bride. He is most interested in the festivities incidental to the wedding and lives in utter ignorance of the fact that by marrying his wife, he is robbing a handsome young officer of his sweetheart. It so happens that the impressionable young stranger catches a pretty rose thrown by the bride at her unfortunate lover. Thinking that the symbolic flower was intended for him, he treasures it as a precious possession and on retiring that night he places the rose between the leaves of his book and then goes off into the land of dreams. In the dream, which is told between the reels portraying the reality, the illusion of the young man seeing things in his sleep is maintained by hundreds of subtle touches. The action, while unreal and never quite coherent, does not at any time become absurdly impossible and therefore hold one's interest. The illusion of the dream is further heightened by the measured spectral movements of the actors and the shadowy settings which have been chosen. Suffice it to say that the dream, which is at first merely odd and confused, gradually grows into an obsession from which the dreamer shakes himself loose with some effort. While in the dream there were at times ghastly and tragic touches, in the reality there is nothing but fun and the prosaic humdrum life. The contrast makes us smile at first and as the producer skilfully emphasizes it, it makes us give way to louder mirth.

The settings have been chosen by the eye of an artist, they always fit to the dot above the i, and the frame always makes the picture seem more perfect. The acting was fine throughout, well considered and characterized by an ability to find the right chords at the right time. "A Venetian Night" will, beyond all doubt, take its rank as a masterpiece.

Francis Carlyle.

FRANCIS CARLYLE, the well-known leading man of the regular dramatic stage, is a recent addition to the stock company of Pathe Freres, where he is playing the part of "Hicks" in "The Perils of Pauline." Mr. Carlyle began his career under the management of Daniel Frohman at the Old Lyceum Theater, appearing in "The Wife," "Sweet Lavender," "The Charity Ball," and many other successes of that noted place.

He has been under the direction of Charles Frohman, however, most of his time on the stage, playing Kerchival West in "Shenandoah," during its first season, and continuing in that part for three years. He was the original "Major Mostyn" in "The Sporting Duchess," also of the leading part in "The White Heather," in "Hearts are Trumps," "Because She Loved Him So," "Colorado," "The Flag Lieutenant" and played "Bertie Cecil" in "Under Two Flags," and "Blance Bates" when it was first produced by Belasco at the Garden Theater. He was leading man at Palmer's Theater and at Daly's, playing there everything, from Shakespeare to modern farce. Also with Willliam Gillette in London, as well as in New York with Nat Goodwin, Otis Skinner, Grace George and Mary Mannering. He played "Captain Absolute" in "The Rivals," and "John Perrybingle" in "The Cricket on the Hearth" with the late Joseph Jefferson.

Francis Carlyle.

His experience has run the gamut, his metier, however, is emotional parts, and his ability to convey by subtle gesture and facial expression, the intense, deeper and stronger feelings which sway all humanity at times, makes for him an especial place in moving picture art. Among the pictures he has appeared in since his association with Pathe Freres are "Her Hour," "A Clever Story," "The Blight," "The Shadow or Shame," "Her story," "The Son of the House," "For the Sake of His Son," "Kenton's Heir" and "The Refugee."

COLES BACK FROM THE COAST.

Mr. H. B. Coles, general manager of the Precision Machine Company of New York, makers of the world famous Simplex projector, has just returned from a trip to the Pacific coast. He reports splendid conditions now existing in California, Oregon and Washington, with prospects for a healthy increase in the entire trade for the next few months.

The general class of theaters which have recently been built in that territory are strictly high grade, being of large seating capacity and of very artistic architecture.

"It is pleasing to note the greater attention paid to the projecion apparatus in the modern theaters," said Mr. Coles. "Formerly an exhibitor would build a theater at considerable expense and at the eleventh hour decide upon the location of the booth and the apparatus to be installed in it, so that the projection would have to adapt itself as best it could to the other conditions; whereas the exhibitor of to-day in building his theater lays out the projection first in order to ensure the very best screen results."

The Precision Machine Company have just established a Projection Engineering Department, which is being taken advantage of by some of the most important exhibitors in the East; and on Mr. Coles' Western trip he impressed upon all exhibitors with whom he came in contact the importance of consulting with authorities in the art of projection when building or remodelling their theaters.

ITS natural classification a "marine comedy," "Love, Luck and Gasoline" covers a very much more extended area than is indicated by the sprightly acting of Airy-Fairy-Lillian and Wally Van in opposition to the ponderous movements of eloquent John Bunny. It is also supposed to cover the identity of a gentleman so well established in motion picture and yachting circles that not to know him or of him is to argue one's self unknown. He plays his role fairly well in the small part assigned him, but—the desolating truth might as well be known—he is not a very much better actor than I am.

However, in compensation for this bitter statement, he has a marvelous picture sense that manifested itself delicately in the Italian pastels he made, that turns lovingly to marines, that might seem to be the endowment of an idealist or a mystic, that is in reality very practical and very broad, embracing both minute and magnificent things, as evidenced in those screen visualizations which bear the stamp of his individuality. As revealed in these, he is the fortunate possessor of acute powers of observation, a master of photodramatic technics, a man of practical ability that serves a poetic imagination in enabling him to record upon the screen his ideas of the invisible quite as well as the visible.

Such is the Commodore who will not have his name published in the cast of "Love, Luck and Gasoline."

Comprehended within of this marine comedy, occupying a large part of the screen portrayal, are some of the most beautiful views of sailing yachts in action ever shown in the pictured story. The vessels are for the most part of the racing type, fish-hulled, sparred to the skies, carrying vast stretches of white canvas aloft, creatures of swan-like grace when wind and sea are mild, laying over in a stiff breeze until it spills from their sails, righting when it looks as though they would be laid flat, leaping foam crests like a trout ascending a waterfall, the most fascinating of all creations devised by the ingenuity of man.

These beautiful pictures will not only delight those who are not "coastwise," but they will impress men who have felt what is stated in the first verse of the Bible, "and the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." In the rhythmic flow of yacht movement, of sea and sky, of water reflections, of cloud-shine, a selective artistic taste is almost constantly revealed, and there is little or nothing to offend fine sensibilities in this romantic realism. The Commodore is gradually achieving a harmony of matter and manner.

The thread of story involved pictures Lillian in the very natural character of a Tomboy, strongly attached to a manly and athletic fellow she is inclined to "doll," genial Wally Van. John Bunny objects in the role of stern father. She elopes with her "Cutey" and the chase that ensues involves the use of sailing yachts, steam yachts, motor boats that fly through the water, aeroplanes that fly through the air and that strange hybrid that flies in water, on water and in the air, all genuine and among the swiftest engines devised to annihilate time and space, forerunners of what succeeding generations will use in exploring the universe.

I had the good fortune to see "Love, Luck and Gasoline" during its first presentation before an ordinary audience, and it seemed to afford both amusement and artistic pleasure to the great mass of people in front.

Sallie Crute.

ONE of the newer faces in Edison films which has already attracted a great deal of favorable attention is that of Sallie Crute. Although only an Edison player for a few months, she has had several opportunities to display her ability and has taken full advantage of them. Miss Crute is a native of Chattanooga, Tenn., but it was in Huntsville, Ala., where her family moved when she was about nine years old, that she first showed a taste for things theatrical. When the colored minstrels had finished their performances on the improvised stage at the old plantation, there would be a call for "Miss Sallie" and the little girl would mount the stage and go through her "stunts." The "stunts" gradually became more and more elaborate until finally "Miss Sallie" awoke to a realization that she was wasting valuable time.

Sallie Crute.

She set earnestly to work and soon became a member of the well-known Elitch Long Stock Company of Denver. Then she played juvenile leading parts and Western heroines for various motion picture concerns. Miss Crute prefers drama to comedy and she has given powerful interpretations of the roles which she has presented on the screen thus far—for instance, the foreign spy in the Cleek picture, "The Mystery of the Talking Wire"; the actress in "The Last Scene of All"; the daughter of the Concura Manufacturer in the anti-tuberculosis film, "The Price of Human Lives"; Ellen Ryan in "A Treacherous Rival," and the lighthouse keeper's daughter in "The Powers of the Air."

Miss Crute is an ambitious girl of serious purpose who puts her whole heart into everything she does. As the burlesque Indian maiden in "A Sense of Humor" and the policeman's newly acquired wife in "A Pious Undertaking," Miss Crute establishes herself as a delightful comedienne. Versatile, clever in her presentation of comic character and dramatic roles and very good to look upon, Sallie Crute is a valuable addition to the Edison stock company.

Under Water Photography.

Expedition of the Submarine Film Company to Watling's Island, Bahamas, to Picture the Photodrama of the Sea.

By John William Kellette.

CARL LOUIS GREGORY, chief cameraman of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, Mutual Film Service, arrived at Nassau, New Providence, B. I., April 7, on the Ward Line Steamship Vigilanta from New York, to be the first man in the world to take motion pictures under water, in the interest of the Submarine Film Company, J. Ernest Williamson, Norfolk, Va., president, son of the inventor of a steel operating chamber and flexible steel tube, welcoming him to that city.

J. E. Williamson.

It is the plan of the company to take under-sea life for educational purposes, releasing their output through the Thanhouser Film Corporation at New Rochelle, and the result will soon be thrown upon the screens in theaters throughout the world taking the Mutual service.

Watling Island, where, it is believed, Columbus first set foot on the new world in 1492, is the final destination of the pioneers in under-sea photography, but the Bahamas will come in for a general survey before filmatization is complete. These islands were picked because of shoal water and the wonderful coral formation. The Bahamas are a group of islands lying north and east of Cuba in about the latitude of Southern Florida. Columbus discovered them in 1492, but they have been in British possession since 1629. Only 25 islands out of 3,060 islands and islets are inhabited, the total population being about 50,000, of which Nassau has 12,000.

Upon one of these islands, Watling's, a small island east-southeast of Cat Island, Columbus first set foot upon the Western Hemisphere. For centuries after their discovery, no direct evidence was available to show which of the 700 islands were entitled to the honor, but in 1874, three hundred years after the death of Bartolomeo de las Casas, Columbus' pilot on his second voyage, the matter was believed to be definitely settled, and in 1891 Walter Wellman led an expedition tracing Columbus' course back from Cuba and fixed upon Watling's Island as the spot where Columbus made the first landing and erected a tablet there with the inscription: "On this spot Christopher Columbus first set foot upon the soil of the New World. Erected June 15, 1891."

For the past few weeks a large steel operating chamber and a long flexible steel tube, capable of withstanding a water pressure of 140 pounds to the square inch, has been built under the supervision of Mr. Williamson, who has had a corps of machinists at work putting it in shape for connection with a boat the corporation has chartered, and the actual work of beginning to find out something about the ocean bottom, two-thirds of which covers the earth's surface, will be under way.

Mr. Gregory's selection as the first man to be thus honored, and whose name undoubtedly will go down in history as the one who blazed the path that is to lead to the lost Atlantis, is because of his thorough knowledge of camera possibilities. Without doubt Mr. Gregory stands alone in his class. As far back as 1906 he was an acknowledged expert in the employ of the United States Government, and in 1908 he was with Burr McIntosh, who engaged him to stage his lectures, and in connection with this duty, Gregory also made lantern slides and took pictures of "Our Navy," "Our Country," "Our Island Possessions," which McIntosh used in his lectures.

In 1909 Mr. Gregory looked upon the moving picture field as fertile, and entered the employ of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., as cameraman, and Horace G. Plimpton thought so much of his ability that he sent him to Cuba to weave educational subjects and romances together for the screen. When the Thanhouser Company started up it secured Gregory, who has been with the concern since the second picture in 1910. In 1913 he was made a producing director and placed in charge of the Princess brand, and shares with Edwin S. Porter, of the Famous Players, the distinction of being one of two directors that do their own camera work. Gregory has always been a pioneer. When C. J. Hite was president of the Mutual Film Corporation last year, now being head of the Thanhouser Corporation, wanted to start a new studio in California, Mr. Gregory was sent to the coast, and located a new site at Brooklyn Heights, Los Angeles, for the New Majestic, returning to go to Cape May with a company to do "water-stuff."

And so, in this case, Mr. Gregory is picked as the pioneer. Anything untried and believed possible, is put up to Gregory to give it a try out. Results are always achieved. Perhaps it will be on account of Gregory's intrepid nature and knowledge that the way to the treasures of Yucatan, Cocos Islands, Trinidad, Zuyder Zee, where the Lutine went down in 1799, off the island of Terschelling with $6,000,000; Cozumel, a pirates' stronghold off the eastern coast of Yucatan, to say

And then, Atlantis, 40,000 years ago, sunk with its 64,000,000 of inhabitants, now supposed to be resting under 12,000 feet of water, won't seem to be so far away after all.

VIOLET HITE SAVES THE NIGHT.

At the North Avenue Theater, New Rochelle, Wednesday night, April 8, Manager John Wentworth, the new head of the theater-de-luxe in this city, was up against it good and hard. It was stormy and the electric power went on the blink, and it was "Thanhouser Night" and widely advertised. And when the audience began to fret and grow uneasy, Miss Violet Hite, sister of C. J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Company, one of those present, tipped Manager Wentworth that perhaps some of the Thanhouser people present could come to his aid, and offered to recite. He jumped at the opportunity, and Miss Hite did herself proud amid the "spot" of two wax candles. Other wax candles were brought and an overture added to the interest, and just as spirits began to flag again, Miss Lila Hayward Chester, the New York Times' prettiest girl, sang, followed later by "Vi" Hite. By this time the audience were praying that the lights would never go on. But, as variety is the spice of life, other "stars" had to be secured, and "Kell" passed the tip to get next to Harry Benham and Jim Cruze, two Thanhouser leads, who, by this time were "slippered and sleepy," but, as soon as they learned that their services were needed they offered to go out into the raw weather to add their bit of entertainment. Before they reached the theater, however, the light situation was straightened out and their services were unnecessary.

A Chat With Authors.

By Percy N. Verkoff.

HAVE you read the story of the modern studio Yorick, his six plots and thirty-six situations, told by Mr. Louis Reeves Harrison in a recent article in the Moving Picture World? If you haven't, do not fail to look it up. You will find it on page 1653 of the March 28th issue.

Mr. Harrison inculcates so much food for thought in and between the lines of this article that no member of the photoplay writing fraternity should afford to leave unread. "Old traditions hang on tenaciously," he says, "and men who write about drama would have us accept conventions we have long known to be false and hollow. Disgust for stage artificiality drove millions to the picture shows, but the Yoricks came swarming after with their six plots and thirty-six situations, with their inherited stock of views and ideas, wth the stage hero, the stage villain, the stage servant, the stage methods and general inability to venture from the beaten paths."

Rather hard words these, aren't they, spoken at a time when the very air seems full with the sounds of blatant tootings about the gigantic progress of the motion picture art. Yes, we have progressed and have had features, too. Real, honest to goodness features—five or eight of them. But how about the many other features, the owners of which have either just barely managed to get booked or would very much like to get a chance to book? With the exception of the above mentioned small number of really splendid productions, such as "Judith of Bethulia," "Quo Vadis?", and "Les Miserables," what is the average so-called feature? Is it an improvement over the story of two or three years ago or just the same old story, liberally padded and strung out to four, five or more reels? Then, again, what about the kind of feature which is produced for the ostensible purpose of uplifting, but in reality to catch the quarters of the morbid and curious? Its success, the optimists will say, has invariably been precarious, while its ephemeral existence has only proved rather than stigmatized the mission of the real photoplay. Granted. But, just the same, what about it? Does it not show that the art of photoplay writing is beginning to decay, rather then flourish; that the old material and the old standards have become stale and inadequate; that the authors are reaching the limit of their resourcefulness, since they are forced to seek novelty in the sensational and even obscene? Indeed, it was about time someone had the courage to elbow his way through the crowd of Yoricks and give writers—and all concerned in the photoplay art—a "poke." And thanks are due Mr. Harrison not only for the "poke," but for pointing out some of the lines along which the photoplay of the future must be constructed to insure success. "We have an entirely new structure to build," he says, "in this new art of visualization, one which will require the work of vigorous thinkers, and this structure must not be trameled by the stale traditions of an older art sadly in need of revitalization. We must use modern systems to suit the progressive age in which we live, respond to the highest ideals of our people, depict the forces that are now making history, dispel the superstitions that fretted the childhood of our race, prevent the spread of vicious tendencies, and open a broad highway to interest in better methods of living."

That the themes Mr. Harrison suggests have heretofore been sadly overlooked, even a superficial examination of the average feature or other production will prove to be correct. Having juggled almost exclusively with the elemental passions, emotions and affections, the author of the Yorick species has naturally been confined to the limited number of combinations of which his scanty material is capable. Not unlike the musician who persisted in composing melodies only, he feels sad because he cannot create infinite variety with only seven notes! It never occurred to him to try composing harmonies, where, with a little more effort and calculation, he could make those same seven notes of his yield infinitely more varied results.

Love, hatred, envy, jealousy, revenge are as indispensable material in the making of human-interest stories as the blood, the air and the food to the subsistence of the body. But, even as blood, air and food alone are not enough to make the body, so cannot the exploitation of elemental passions per se make the ideal photoplay of the future. It must have depth as well as length and width. The author must select his themes from the life of the present, not the literature of the past. He must cultivate powers which will enable him to dissect and analyze conditions as they exist, not as he imagines them to be. In inviting others to see what he points out as cause and effect, he must make sure that his own vision is not blurred by false impressions, political hysteria or religious dogma. Artistic and original he must needs always be, yet at all times convincing and instructive.

In the face of the big financial returns which have been lately waxing the bank accounts of successful authors, some of them will undoubtedly point to the features now on profitable exhibition and say that our suggestions are rather "cheeky." Very well, gentlemen, perhaps they are. But permit me to ask: how long do you think such features will last? Attracted by alluring advertising, the public may now go to see them. But how long will it be before that same public, satiated and disgusted, will demand the better class offering we advocate? To ignore this question by not anticipating it, is to deliberately antagonize the goose that lays the golden eggs. Remember, you may hypnotize the public into biting a lemon and imagining it is an orange for some time, for not all the time. After all, the suggestions here made are not such a radical deviation from the natural course of events in the development of any art as to be impossible. All they imply is merely a matter of growth. We have increased the mechanical length of our productions, let us now broaden their scope. A matter of rising a little higher so as to enlarge our horizon, that's all. Whereas we wrote stories about love and only love, let us henceforth try to write stories about things we have not sufficiently exploited before, using the element of love, etc., as the condiment or spice of our literary puddings. Let us try to lift the thin crust that covers our social, political and economic life and show the public the inside clock-works of these things. They will be amused as well as be edified. For instance, let us tackle power as a theme. "Power," by the way, would make a bully title. Let us show what makes some people excessively powerful, while others, excessively weak. Let us paint, with unmistakable colors, that type of octopus who has gained power merely through knowing how to take advantage of the weak. Let us help those whom the octopus grinds and squeezes, by pointing out how much was lost through apathy toward things concerning public welfare. Let us help educate the young to understand their individual and collective responsibilities when voting day comes around. Let us study these and many other things, and write about them so they can be visualized accurately, yet artistically and convincingly. When the photoplay writing brotherhood shall have done these things, then, and only then, may we conscientiously pride ourselves that we have helped the photoplay come unto its own; namely, to being the potent amusement and educational factor it should be.

Rosemary Theby.

IT is a simple matter to reduce the secret of Rosemary Theby's success as player in the mute drama to two words: Infinite pains. Her beauty, intelligence and womanliness have only partly contributed to her position; it is her positive gifts as an actress to which Miss Theby owes her prominence, and her conscientiousness, her painstaking care of the smallest details, have kept her there.

Rosemary Theby.

Hardly two years in photoplay, Miss Theby's steady course upward is as interesting as it is exceptional. Before making her small beginning in studio work she had the benefit of thorough instruction in acting. She needed only to adapt her knowledge to the demands of the screen. That, in itself, gave her a great advantage over the usual novice, and when her chances came, one after another, they found her prepared and able to do herself justice. She is now leading woman for the Lubin actor-director, Harry Myers, and is today as watchful of the trifles that go to make perfection as she was when she played her first small bit.

She realizes the importance of every medium which contributes to the fullest expression of emotion and has found it worth while to take special courses in fencing, dancing and pantomime in connection with her studio engagements.

"Pie for Sophie." (Essanay)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

"Pie for Sophie" is a screaming Western farce, of the slapstick brand, by Essanay, that will find favor with all who require such stimulants to excite hilarity. Few who view the mirthful incidents, which mark the experiences of two unlucky German musicians, will be able to resist the guffaws that demand an outlet from compressed lungs.

Scene from "Pie For Sophie" (Essanay).

Sophie Clutts (Miss Margaret Joslyn) is present with both feet in the fun-making, and her checkmating of the ear-splitting musicians, Snicklefritz and Jobberwat, is as mirthful as the best of her former efforts. Victor Potel and Harry Todd, farce comedians of the acrobatic type, are exceedingly amusing in their neck-breaking escapades, and Pat Rooney, as the "Bad Man," performs his stunts in a thoroughly typical make-up. The incidents are laid in the mythical town of Snakeville, and the atmosphere is reminiscent of the old West of many years ago.

The release date is set for Thursday, April 30.

DARK CLOUD.

DARK CLOUD, of the Reliance Western studios, is one of the finest horsemen working in moving pictures. There are some who claim for him that he is the best bareback rider employed by any amusement organization. He is a Sioux and the son of a chieftain who fought Custer in the Black Hills on that memorable day in 1876 when not a single white man survived the fury of the Indian assault.

Dark Cloud.

Trained from infancy to the saddle and the life of the plains, Dark Cloud needed little coaching to become one of the most valuable actors now in the employ of the Reliance Western company. Absolutely fearless, a hard rider, capable of catapulting himself from the saddle in scenes where he is required to "play dead," Dark Cloud sets an example to his white brothers which requires them to work their hardest to emulate him.

Since he joined the ranks of the Reliance players, Dark Cloud has gathered from all sources a wardrobe which is the envy of every Indian living north or south of the Rio Grande. Although he is a graduate of the Carlisle Indian School, Dark Cloud takes much pride in "making up" in his war paint, and at several fancy dress balls held recently by the colony of photoplayers in Los Angeles he easily romped away with the prize offered for the most original costume.

A polished gentleman in every-day life, Dark Cloud has become a favorite with his fellow players. Recently an informal testimonial dinner was given in his honor, and Dark Cloud, who won several prizes in intercollegiate debate while a student at the Carlisle Indian School, brought tears to the eyes of his hosts by the pathetic eloquence of his extemporaneous speech on "The Decline of My People."

Vitagraph Theater Changes Bill.

"Mr. Barnes of New York" Heads a Program of Finely Varied Entertainment—Warm Greeting for Flora Finch.

By George Blaisdell.

THE first material change in the bill at the Vitagraph Theater since its opening on February 7 occurred on the evening of Monday, April 13. It was a full house and a most appreciative one that greeted the new faces on the screen and on the stage. The occasion also marked the passing into the theaters of the country through the General Film Company of "A Million Bid," that rare five-reel melodrama, and "Goodness Gracious," the three-reel laugh-maker. Present with their respective guests were the members of the Vitagraph triumvirate, Messrs. Rock, Blackton and Smith. Mr. Blackton, who played the role of The Commodore in "Love, Luck and Gasoline," was described in the printed cast as "a motorboat enthusiast." It was impossible, however, for him to hide himself behind that anonymity in that house, especially on that night, and his appearance on the screen was greeted with applause. All of the players were applauded on their "entrances," be the same physical or shadowy. Miss Flora Finch, the popular eccentric comedian of the company, got a greeting she will remember. So, also, did Lillian Walker, Wally Van, Hughie Mack and Etienne Girardot.

The program was notable for its rich variety—from a screen viewpoint it was ideal. The first subject was a single reel devoted to "California Alligator Industry" and "Beautiful California." The former is an interesting educational with a comedy element. We see the way alligators are raised—see them in the shell and emerging from it, see them in three to five year old droves, and then the big fellows from five to fifty years old. There were hundreds of them. "Beautiful California" constitutes a series of pictures taken in the vicinity of the Vitagraph's Santa Monica studio. It is a fine scenic. The views of great cliffs rising sheer from the ocean, others of a storm-whipped surf breaking over piers and bulkheads and the sudden transition to a sunrise out of unruffled waters and seen through a natural tree framework from the heights of Santa Catalina brought out hearty manifestations of approval. Then followed "Mr. Barnes of New York," a six-reel drama "picturized" from Archibald C. Gunter by Eugene Mullin. It had the Vitagraph stamp in acting, direction and photography. It will be reviewed in the World next week.

Then the screen ascended, revealing the stage set for the silent portrayal of "The New Stenographer." Miss Finch has the role of Lucille Montgomery, the new stenographer of Brown & Robinson. Wally Van as the clerk and Etienne Girardot and Hughie Mack as the real estate dealers individually yield nothing to the two others in efforts to keep out of her immediate vicinity. Great changes take place in their attitude, however, when in walks Miss Lillian announcing that Aunty is taking a needed rest and that she has been sent to fill her place. "Cutey" is in strong right from the first, with Brown and Robinson fighting for position. Albert Roccardi is the grotesquely attired and much mustached husband who calls at the end of the day to escort Lillian home, to the abounding dismay of the whole establishment. The return of Lucille restores the status quo ante-bellum, and negative unanimity again prevails where there had been discord. As the gushing Miss Lucille sweeps in with her young trunkload of cosmetics and medicines and spatters and scatters them about her machine she is conscious only of her own irresistible charms. Her costume is a genuine Finch creation. Not to put too fine a point on it and to refer to just one phase of it that on the opening night seemed to proclaim its presence a little more loudly than any other one single factor there is an inverted V slash in the front of her pink gown which reveals green silk pantalettes with plaid edging —or something like that, anyway. The skit is even funnier than was the old-time Vitagraph picture from which it was taken—and old-time picturegoers will remember that.

"Love, Luck and Gasoline," which is reviewed in another column, was the final number on a program bound to add to the prestige of this unique house.

"Forgiven; or, the Jack o' Diamonds"

The Stellar Photoplay's Initial Production a Fine Melodrama In Which Edwin Forsberg Heads a Strong Cast.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Stellar Photoplay Company selected as the medium through which to make its bow to picturegoers the old-time melodrama of "Forgiven; or, The Jack o' Diamonds," in which for a long time Frederick Bryton starred. The screened result proves it a wise decision. As it comes from the revising pen of Bennett Musson and the directing hand of William Robert Daly it makes fine entertainment. There is a good story, and it is played by old-time, skilled actors. Furthermore, the outdoor photography is of excellent quality. Frank Carroll, the president of the company, who journeyed with the players to St. Augustine, where the picture was filmed, remarked at the initial showing at the New York Theater that it had been the object of the producers to avoid the sensational, the blood and thunder, and to depend upon straight, legitimate dramatic effort in the making of his play. It is true that there are a couple of well-directed shots in the sixth and last reel, but they will be received in the same spirit as was the comment of a fellow-townsman on the death of a certain notorious character. In response to an inquiry as to the complaint he is alleged to have replied: "No complaint; everybody satisfied."

Edwin Forsberg plays John Diamond, the gambler, who marries and goes to work, but who is too hasty in condemning his wife when she is guilty only in so far as she has failed as her husband also has failed in detecting the real character of Graham, the libertine, to whom their house had been at all times open. Graham is one of those males incapacitated congenitally or otherwise from making an original selection of a female. That he meets his death at the hand of a man whose life he had ruined as he tried to ruin Diamond's, and failed only because of the latter's strength of character, seems but a carrying out of the demands of exact even if it is unlawful justice. Mr. Forsberg makes good and more in his screen debut. He has magnetism—the indefinable quality so essential to success before the camera. He will remind some of Sid Olcott—and that is no left-handed compliment, either—aside from the fact that he is more robust. The eyes are almost identical. Mr. Forsberg wins the interest and the sympathy in the first scenes when he appears as the steamboat gambler. He holds both through his adventurous career. Frederick Burton plays Graham, and plays it well.

Caroline French, as Annie Dennison, and later the wife of Diamond, gives a splendid performance. She will be remembered as the woman who played opposite Tully Marshall in All Star's "Paid in Full." She knows how to portray the wife—a real helpmate in days of happiness in spite of a slim exchequer and a real woman in days of adversity following her impetuous and mistaken husband's departure from her home—but always the wife and as well the mother of her daughter.

Hector Dion is Popham, the man who goes into the gutter after Graham has induced Mrs. Popham to leave her husband. It is Popham who at the denouement shoots the Mexican, strongly played by Daniel Bertona, when he sees from his hiding place that it is not a duel Graham intends to fight with Diamond, but that he is about to encompass his opponent's death by murder. Mr. Dion has had much experience before the camera—he is one of the old-timers if he is a young man—and here he brings all of it into play. His characterization of the sot is vivid, but it will never alienate the pitying sympathy of the adult.

Luke J. Loring is Denver Dan, the gambling partner of Diamond, as he is later the business partner. Mr. Loring transfers to the screen the interpretation of the character he has many times played before the footlights. He is the real thing, there is never any doubt of that. Big, hearty, true blue, strong in his friendship, it is Dan who furnishes the bit of comedy in his efforts to win old maid Aunt Cordelia, played by Ricca Allen. The detestation of Aunty for Dan the gambler is almost as pronounced as is the alacrity she displays years later in falling into the arms of the reformed, transformed Daniel Peabody, rancher. It is Dan who shoots Graham at the last. Fritzi Brunette has the role of the daughter of Diamond. Little Lois Alexander completes a strong cast, individually, collectively.

The backgrounds are of the St. John's River, in charming old St. Augustine, and the country in that vicinity. The opening scenes are on a river steamer, running close in to the vegetation-lined shore. There is a dramatic scene in the first reel when Jack o' Diamonds sees the crooked gamblers cheating Graham and takes his place at the table, winning back the money by cleverly intercepting the card passed under the table to one of his opponents. There is a bit of bloodless gunplay, but it is thrilling. In the second reel Popham, down and out, a drunkard, comes to St. Augustine in search of Graham. His assault on the libertine fails. Graham overpowers him and, telling him his wife is in Santa Clara, offers him money to go to her. There's a predicament to give a man pause! This is one of Mr. Dion's big situations. He finally takes the money, only to learn on arrival at his destination his wife has been dead for several years.

There are good views of a horse race. So, also, are there many interesting bits of the oldest city in the United States. There are a number of "convenient coincidences" in the working out of the story as there are very apt to be in the old-style melodrama—and in the present-day style, too, for that matter. Nevertheless, Director Daly gives us a good picture, one that holds the first four reels and moves in the final two—especially so at the denouement. "Forgiven" has a conclusion as satisfying as it is dramatic.

BLACHÉ EXCHANGE FOR DES MOINES.

With offices in the Observatory Building, a new exchange has been established by Herbert Blaché in Des Moines, Iowa. Burton Garrett, traveling representative for Blaché and Solax features, who is now in Des Moines giving the exchange his personal attention, reports excellent business conditions in the feature market of Iowa, and gives as proofs a list of bookings that is remarkable for the few days that the exchange has been open for business.

Mr. Blaché has secured the services of K. T. Loper, formerly connected with the Page Amusement Company and prominently identified with theatrical activities in Iowa, who will devote his energy to building up the business of the new Blaché exchange.

Opening of the Strand.

The New House Crowded Long Before the Hour Set for Opening—A Look at the Audience, the Program and the Performance.

By W. Stephen Bush.

LIKE the hospitable giant in the fable, the great Strand Theater stretched out its arms in welcome to New York and New York responded with enthusiastic eagerness. The opening of the biggest motion picture theater in the world took place last Saturday, April 11. The doors had been opened in the afternoon and thousands of friends of the motion picture had examined and admired and rejoiced. The light of a typical spring day was slowly fading away when the huge sign of electric letters blazed forth and announced that "The Strand" had taken its place and rank in the glories and attractions of Broadway. A cleverly imitated flash of lightening alternated with the letters composing the words "The Strand" and attracted constant attention.

A little after seven o'clock the management had to put huge signs on the sidewalk before the theater announcing that every seat in the vast theater had been sold and that even "standing room only" was but a hope. A long procession of handsome autos passed slowly but steadily in front of the attractive entrance and each car discharged its passengers, most of them in evening dress. The whole aspect of things was far more suggestive of a night at the opera than a motion picture entertainment. By eight o'clock the big theater was filled to its utmost capacity. Groups of prosperous-looking theatergoers gathered about the entrance and the lobbies, voicing well-bred disappointment at being unable to share in the glories of the first night. On entering the theater the spectator unconsciously yielded to that singular atmosphere of art and comfort which Manager Rothapfel is able to provide with so little apparent effort. Particularly tasteful were the uniforms of the little army of ushers and doorkeepers. Equally acceptable was the courteous behavior of these ushers, who had evidently been trained in a school of Chesterfieldian principles. The suffused light was part of the atmosphere, likewise the low, sweet, discursive music of the orchestra hidden in a pall of black.

The Audience.

The quality of audiences at motion picture entertainments has been improving, as everybody knows, for the last three or four years, but the demonstration of the fact was never made more complete than Saturday night. Consciously and unconsciously the world of amusement and of art in amusement had been looking forward to the palatial home of the quality picture and consequently the lobby of the theater and other portions as well looked at times like an animated edition of "Who's Who in Society." William N. Selig, the producer of "The Spoilers," came on from Chicago especially to witness the first presentation of his big picture, which was the piece de resistance of the program. Others in sight were Daniel Frohman, Justice Erlanger, A. L. Erlanger, Fire Commissioner Adamson, the famous tenor, Andreas Dippel; Edward Abeles, Paul Armstrong, Adolf Zukor, William Elliott, Wallace Munroe, Digby Bell, George M. Cohan, Samuel H. Harris; William Farnum, who takes the leading part in the photoplay, "The Spoilers," saw himself as others see him, sitting in a box not far from the screen. Of course the motion picture interests were strongly represented.

While a large sprinkling of the first-nighters knew but little of what can be done with motion pictures and had only imperfect notions gained, perhaps, in cheap theaters, the majority of the vast audience consisted of enthusiasts to whom the motion picture is the only and favorite amusement. There were many indications of this fact. Running comment as of the pictures, a rule quite discriminating, is a sure sign of the presence of enthusiasts. They will criticize the work of producer and actor while it is running on the screen. They were doing it quite freely until "The Spoilers" came on later in the night, and then the running comment was hushed—the fascination of the play was all-powerful. Another evidence of the numerous "fans" was the faint ripple of applause that greeted the appearance of Miss Kathlyn Williams on the screen. That was the Chautauquan salute of the brotherhood of enthusiasts. It always greets the appearance of a real favorite.

The Performance.

The whispered impatience that began to gather strength in the continued semi-darkness grew somewhat more pronounced when a sound as of two or three shots of heavy artillery created an instant of profound silence through every part of the house and before the audience could recover from its surprise the orchestra began to play "The Star-Spangled Banner." A second afterward we saw in lightening rapidity the scenes which inspired the deathless hymn of glory. In the roar and sweat of battle the starry flag still breezed in eloquent triumph over the brave hearts of the country's defenders. With the swiftness of thought the audience recognized the happy inspiration of sending the new theater on its career to the strains of patriotic music with this rare glimpse of American glory visualized and, as we all stood up in loving homage, no one failed to congratulate the management on its inspiration. At the same time Rothapfel unmasked his batteries, the darkness in and about the screen was converted into a flood of light and the splendid decorations, the flowers, the hedges of green, the graceful fountains of changing color, and the pretty effects in the wings stood revealed as if by magic. The orchestra helped the audience express its admiration with a lively air and there was another well deserved tribute in a strong wave of applause.

The first number on the program was the Pathe Weekly, which is always interesting and generally has some thrill strong enough for a ripple of applause. A short, but splendidly rendered solo by a well trained soprano, rested the eye while it charmed the ear. A most charming "scenic" followed, and though it was sent on its way without titles and did not find a place on the official program, it was thoroughly appreciated, the audience repeatedly becoming demonstrative. The photography of this picture, evidently of Italian make and portraying some of the beauties of Italy, was of the highest order and made the picturesque stand out with wonderful effect.

Just as we had begun to scoop ocular delights from this pretty picture a rarely pure and rich tenor voice flowed out from the screen and voice and picture and music blended into a most novel and charming whole. The pleasingly unexpected always happens where Rothapfel presents the picture and this dainty bit of innovation was relished by the audience in profound appreciative silence.

A Keystone comedy followed and threw the audience into perfect fits of laughter. In rapid succession we saw the Mutual Girl paying a visit to The Strand and being entertained by Rothapfel; the audience, thinking this part of the program quite apropos, entered into the fun of the thing and enjoyed it all hugely. Then came the quartet from "Rigoletto," which could not have been rendered more perfectly in the great temple of music further down the street.

And now came the great event of the night—the presentation of "The Spoilers." The right musical environment was there from the start as might have been expected and that it added much to the force of this virile and thoroughly American play need not be mentioned. It was a happy idea of the management to put the picture on without any break whatever. "The Spoilers" as a novel is one of those books that we like to read to the end if possible, and where we cannot indulge our impulse we always lay the volume down with regret. Breaks and pauses in a running visualization of the novel would be even less welcome than interruptions in the reading. That the audience was well pleased with this new wrinkle was plain. It absorbed the story without an effort and its interest never lagged—at 11:30 we were more interested in the fate of Glenister and all the rest than at 9:15, though we had been looking intently at the screen for more than two hours.

It would be impossible to praise the projection. Whatever the cause the pictures were not perfectly projected. Every new machine creaks before it gets smoothly under way and one cannot expect perfection at the very start, especially where the preparations went on under such tremendous pressure. It must be pointed out, however, that projection is the cornerstone of every motion picture entertainment and all build in vain who build without this one idea uppermost in their minds.

The screen used was the Radium Gold Fibre Screen made by the Atsco, Inc., located at 218 West 42nd Street. It was the unanimous verdict of the experts that he screen gave enire satisfaction.

The tickets were sold by means of the Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company, which accounted in good measure for the easy handling of the enormous crowds.

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to the World.)

THE British trade is in mourning for the death of its most distinguished producer. Sir Hubert Von Herkomer, the eminent painter who recently took to film-producing upon artistic lines, died two days ago at the age of sixty-four. With his career in the realm of art, Americans will be quite familiar for it was at the St. Louis Exhibition that he attained the zenith of his fame, but from a kinematographic point of view his name may not be so widely known, inasmuch as he only commenced operations late last season and I see from a recent issue of the World that his first two releases have only recently been placed upon the American market. His son, it is understood, will now direct the Herkomer Film Company at their studios at Bushbey near London.

The second feature picture of the London Film Company Goldsmith's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer," was exhibited privately last week and manifested itself as a revelation among British comedies. There is an enormous number of scenes, some of the reviewers say there are too many, but the elaborate staging effects will form an adequate excuse for their number.

A leading authority on photography says that British film producers have at last awakened to the fact that it is quite as necessary to pay as much attention to the problem of lighting and technique as it is to movement and plot. The fault in the past has lain more with the producer than the cameramen; the work of the latter is to take the scene arranged by the producer, an individual who more often than not knows nothing of photography and is in the habit of paying far more attention to action than lighting, hence the flatness so common in British-made film pictures. The work done by the cameraman is rarely considered, so long as he keeps the handle of the camera going at the proper speed, the actors in the field of view, his stop and focus right, his work is rarely criticised by those over him. He is, in fact, very often the only man in the crowd who understands photography and yet he has the least to do in the matter of producing. The man to improve things and in whose hands lies the future of the British film trade is the producer, an individual who is in most cases a showman first and a master of light and shade last.

At last Tuesday's meeting of the London County Council the question of whether private trade exhibition theaters should be licensed under the same conditions as public picture theaters was again discussed and it was decided to make a test case in the High Court. The Vitagraph Company, of Charing Cross Road, London, have been selected as the first victim and the case will be contested by the Manufacturers' Association and is marked down for hearing at an early date.

What Larry Trimble describes as the best Turner film produced in this country is announced for release on May 4th. It is entitled "The Murdoch Trial," and is a melodramatic production that allows Miss Turner full play of her exquisite emotional potentialities.

Cecil Raleigh, the Drury Lane playwright, has at last been tempted to permit some of his most notable creations to be produced before the camera, but not by a British firm. The Lubin Company had to pay a stiff figure for the exclusive rights of the plays, "The Red Ruby," "White Heather" and three others. "Sealed Orders," the play over which the action in the High Court has scarcely yet cooled, is not included in the contract.

TRADE BANQUET IN PARIS.

Many Representative Men High in the Trade Foregather in the French Capital and Become Friendly.

THE annual moving picture trade banquet was held on Thursday, March 26, in the great salons of the Hotel Continental, rue Castiglione, Paris. More than five hundred persons were present and the feast cost something approaching $1,500. At the sixteen tables were seated representatives of every branch of the industry. Paul Deschanel, the distinguished statesman and president of the Chamber of Deputies, graced the company with his presence and occupied the chair. A host of cinematograph people from other countries were among the guests. At the Anglo-American table there was a merry party of English-speaking people, including Editor E. T. Heron, of the Kinematograph Weekly, London; Editor Cabourn, of "The Bioscope"; London representative, Jim Downie, of the Trans-Atlantic; Sutto, of Milano's and the General Film Agency; Lehmann, Edison Company's Paris representative; R. A. Reader, of the Vitagraph Company; Helfer, joyful at the success of Selig pictures; West, head of the famous Australian moving picture enterprise and many other well-known personalities.

At this table there was never a dull moment throughout the long evening (while Charles Pathe delivered his speech the clock chimed eleven and there was still a lot to follow.) Abe Keffenburgh, not content with the liquid portion of the menu, ordered magnum, and in between the speeches entertained his friends with the latest stories from Broadway. Altogether it was just like old days in New York City.

In the course of his brilliant discourse, Monsieur Deschanel spoke of his visit to Thomas A. Edison's laboratory and lauded the Kinetoscope. He outlined the progress of cinematography, mentioning non-flam film and color pictures. He said moving picture men had greater fields to explore than those in the theatrical business for what theatrical scenery could equal that of nature and what actors could compare with the players of real life. He said adaptations from books and the stage made picture theatergoers want to visit the theaters and read books. He cited instances as "Le Cid," "Pherde" and "Les Miserables," all of which films were released by Pathe Freres. M. Deschanel spoke at length on the wonders of actuality pictures and pointed out what wonderful pictures we might be able to see today if the cinematograph had existed earlier; pictures showing such scenes as Napoleon at the Italian Campaign, Moliere before Louis XIV, Mahomet, Coesar, etc. The president of the Chamber of Deputies was loudly applauded.

Monsieur Robert de Flers spoke on behalf of the Authors' Society, and said that the society had no intention to be aggressive to the film business by imposing unreasonable taxes. M. de Flers' speech was one of the cleverest made and it gained for him vociferous applause and a multitude of friends for the Society of Authors. Leon Gaumont, decrying the use of script, gave a snappy little oration and repeated his forecasts regarding cheap film. Leopold Bellan, president of the Society of Modern Education, in eloquent terms urged manufacturers of films and appartus to hustle and do more for the work of educating the people with the people's educator—the cinematograph. Following the dinner was given an entertainment which included many numbers by artists of the Paris opera and leading theaters.

Altogether the banquet was an historic event and it should not only do much to cement the friendship of all members of the French trade, who hitherto have not been on the best of terms. It should help to bring France into still closer touch with other nations, notably England and America.

JOHN CHER.

EBERHARD SCHNEIDER IN GERMANY.

In a short communication received a few days since, Mr. Schneider advises that business is pretty fair in the Fatherland and states his belief that there is less annoyance to the industry on that side of the water than there is in free America from the censorship question. He is making the most of a short visit and find the German national beverage as fine as ever.

Moving Picture Educator

SAMSON.

PLEASED with the appearance of a new Biblical subject as an addition to the list of educational pictures, of which we cannot have too many, it became the privilege of the writer to review this film, with the object of recording his impressions in the "Educator." From the fact that biblical and religious subjects require such delicate handling, the first thought which presents itself is as to what motive inspires the adoption of any particular biblical subject. In Samson we have two strangely divided characters: the man of great physical strength, and the man of great moral weakness; so that in undertaking to present him on the screen the producer must undertake to present him in his full biblical truthfulness; or, lacking this, he must be so presented that the object for which he was ordained of Jehovah must be carefully preserved, otherwise there is a danger of falling into the snare of emphasizing his unfortunately weaker parts. In this particular presentation it is noticeable that many of the most interesting events of Samson's higher life are omitted, while there is scarcely an omission of any of the scenes of his lower life, If Samson, the strong man, is to be depicted—for such is his title to fame—would not the threefold great trials of strength which were developed under the deceitful influences of Delilah, have given splendid opportunities for both a good presentation, as well as affording occasion for unusually good acting on the part of those engaged? Instead of this, however, this important series of events is dismissed with a weak display of the breaking of a common rope, which leaves no impression upon the audience. On the other hand, scenes of lewdness are produced in greater detail; the visit to the harlot of Gaza is not calculated to produce an impression commendable to the whole picture, if it does not ultimately condemn it.

That there are some good parts in this film must be readily acknowledged, the killing of the lion, the carrying away the gates of Gaza, the slaying of a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass, the grinding at the mill and the last great feat of destroying the temple of Dagon, have each their merit. There is no doubt that Mr. J. Warren Kerrigan makes a great Samson, and does much justice to the part so far as he was permitted to play it, yet even here we are puzzled to know why, after his capture by the Philistines, Samson is always so nearly naked; surely there was no need to have him less clothed than others of his fellow prisoners.

The fact that Mr. Kerrigan is such a splendid specimen of physical manhood, emphasizes this and it is unfortunate to have to carry away in one's memory the picture of a near-naked man in the midst of the most important scenes. The science and the art of picture making is no part of this review, neither is the ability of the actors dwelt upon here; the writer's viewpoint is purely educational, coupled with careful observations as to how biblical pictures are treated and produced. From a biblical standpoint full justice is not accorded the person and mission of Samson, indeed his mission is not perceived to any one not familiar with his life and its purposes; therefore it loses its value educationally to a great extent. If it should be contended that the picture is neither a biblical portrayal, or an educationally inclined one, but rather as "a drama of life," it would certainly seem that had it been cast along Samson's higher level, rather than along the lower level, it would be better received, and more highly commended.

MOVING PICTURES OF ELMENDORF DAIRY.

The Chicago Feature Film Company has been taking moving pictures for the past two weeks of the great Elmendorf estate, near Lexington, Ky. The estate covers over nine thousand acres and is worth two and a quarter million dollars. The magnificent mansion is surrounded by beautiful gardens and extensive hot houses, filled with rare plants and tropical fruits.

The Elmendorf estate is known to have the largest and most modern dairy in the world. Nearly one thousand cows, every one a thoroughbred, supply milk for the dairy. A modern bakery, laundry and ice plant are also maintained. Five thousand feet of films will be used in depicting this great institution.

PROGRESSIVE WISDOM IN SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK.

It is with great pleasure we can record the fact that in a wise and official manner the moving picture has been taken up by the Sunday School. During the last few weeks notice has been taken of the fact that in conventions of day schools in this country, and in Europe, the teachers have evaded the question of education by kinematography. In some places they have been accused of ulterior motives, while in others it has been very plain that ignorance, pure and simple, has been the cause. It has now fallen to the lot of a Sunday School Convention to blaze the way in this cause of progress. This is not new; it has been previously noticed that the manufacturers have received inquiries from three times as many ministers as they have from school masters; also that the churches have taken the lead over the schools in profitable uses of the moving picture.

The first honors, however, must be given to the State of Texas; here, for the first time, moving pictures have been given a place on the program, also official activity is noticed from the fact that a "Committee on Moving Pictures" was appointed; this means that certain and definite work is intended. It is a pleasure to re-print on this page a copy of the action of this convention exactly as it was received from the secretary of the above-mentioned committee, with the hope that it may stimulate other conventions of educators, sacred and secular, to follow this praiseworthy example:

Resolution Adopted by the Texas State Sunday School Association, Ft. Worth, Texas, March 27, 1914.

Whereas, in aducational work the Sunday Schools and Missionary Societies of our churches are resorting more and more to the motion picture for instruction and entertainment, and

Whereas, our churches are having great difficulty in securing the right kind of educational pictures, as well as Bible and mission pictures, and

Whereas, we believe if the motion picture companies would enter more largely into the production of this type of motion pictures, there would be a tremendous demand for such pictures,

Be it resolved, that we in convention assembled, urge the film producers to prepare for supplying such pictures to our churches, and

Be it resolved, second, that a committee be appointed by the chair to convey this expression to the leading film producers.

PROJECTION MACHINES IN NEW FIELDS.

Among recent installations of Power's Cameragraph No. 6A projecting machines was one in the New Rochelle High School at New Rochelle, N. Y. This machine was sold through the Picture Theater Equipment Company of New York City.

An order for a Power's Cameragraph No. 6A projecting machine has been received from James W. Jones, director of exhibits of the executive commission of Boise, Idaho. This machine will later be used at the San Francisco International Exposition in 1915 to show the wonderful possibilities of the State of Idaho.

The State Homeopathic Hospital at Middletown, N. Y., has installed a Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motion picture projecting machine.

A Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motion picture projecting machine was installed at the Grand Central Palace, and was used from April 4th to 11th by the National Efficiency Exposition and Conference to demonstrate methods of efficiency.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

Incidental Versus Concert Music.

D. Edward Porter, New York City, writes:

As the popularity of the picture show grows, so does the importance of the musical setting or accompaniment. The tendency of the times is to adopt extreme measures in the matter of music, either to do without it entirely; to hand out a sop with a piano and drum, or to engage an orchestra of reasonable proportions and endeavor to reap the benefit of the extra expenditure by requiring the musicians to play continuously regardless of the action of the pictured figures on the screen.

One would think that theatrical experience gained in years of producing spoken drama would have developed a knowledge of play-craft that would recognize the effectiveness of absolute silence on occasion as a distinct dramatic value in the representation of a play, as it is recognized in the presentation of the spoken drama. The real worth of music as an adjunct to the play is lost or cheapened by pouring it into the ears of the audience by the continuous method.

I know of several theaters where the policy of the manager in this surfeit of music, regardless of his audience, has resulted in the musicians relinquishing the engagement through exhaustion. Even in the new photoplays for which special music has been written, so much has been written that the effect has been lost in a monotonous round of continuous sound.

If one of these house managers would take a night off some time and see a show like Faversham's "The Faun," or one of Mr. William Shakespeare's dramas or tragedies, and listen intelligently to the incidental music, he might see a glimmer of light in the musical setting of his own picture plays—to his profit, to the pleasure and relief of a surprised clientele, the delight of the playwright and to the real benefit of the amusement field with which he is identified.

The abandonment of the hideous carousell effect of the mechanical organ with the substitution of a real orchestra playing incidental music which is distributed intelligently throughout the play and not poured like a thick gravy over its entire surface, cannot fail to improve the picture business.

And, I take it, that's what you're after.

The saying "music for the pictures is still in its infancy" has become trite. However oft repeated, it is still true. Music for the picture is not yet developed to its full value, and this through no paucity of opinions, ideas, systems and methods on the part of the thinking picture musicians. The wide divergence of opinion as to what picture music really should be, seemingly holds good with the picture-seeing public as with picture-playing musicians. Personally the editor of this department agrees with Mr. Porter, but with certain limitations. In my opinion it depends on the calibre of both the picture and the audience. I have seen pictures—particularly some of the better class of dramatic pictures—which pleased me better without musical accompaniment. But others think differently.

There is one photoplay house I frequently visit at the supper hour when the musicians are off duty. I see the pictures in absolute quiet and enjoy the relaxation. But that is not an argument; it is only something which comes from my own personal feelings at the time. Possibly many of the criticisms we read are of like origin.

A few years ago I advocated this rule: "The music should be continuous or nearly so." The "nearly so" left room for possible dramatic pauses which might occur. I see no reason to change my opinion regarding pictures of the same class as were most common three or four years ago. But the character of pictures is changing. Not all of them, it is true; but recent years have brought a rapidly increasing number of photo-dramas superior in many ways (including length), to the old order of things, and these often demand a special treatment in their exhibition. A six, eight, or twelve reel photoplay is a different proposition from a one-hour show consisting of two full reels, a split and a comic song. The latter still exists to a considerable extent, though the song is giving place to another reel in some houses.

Mr. Porter's reference to "The Faun" and Shakespeare would lead us to infer he is thinking of the really good feature photo-dramas in recommending incidental music to be played in the same manner for pictures as for plays of the class named. I believe that in many instances—particularly for the better class of dramatic pictures—the music could be introduced with great effect in certain scenes and situations only, remaining silent at other times the same as in the spoken drama. I believe some pictures could be given with great effect without any musical accompaniment at all. I also believe many pictures—especially the common run—will give more satisfaction to the average observer and listener if accompanied by music "continuous or nearly so." It all depends. I saw a short biblical picture put on by Rothapfel accompanied throughout by Gounod's "Ave Marie." First it was played as a violin solo; then the 'cello picked it up. At a certain point his soprano singer appeared at one side and sang the number through and at the finish the 'cello again picked it up as a solo and played it to the end of the picture. Here was a picture accompanied throughout by solos, vocal and instrumental, and yet it did not seem to conflict. Even when the singer appeared it did not detract; rather it all seemed a part of the picture. Now this wouldn't work in every case. As I said before, it all depends—first on your picture, next on your audience. Of course, the exhibitor and musician have a prominent share, but without the proper picture and audience their efforts are nil.

While on the subject, those managers and exhibitors who show the long feature films—such as will make a two or two and a half hour entertainment—might do worse than pattern after the legitimate theater in regard to their music. The intermissions should, of course, be filled with music. Here is where your overtures and other concert numbers belong. Then during the play have your music play to the most essential points only in the photo-drama. And keep the music down pianissimo; swell only where it is required for effect. This is what Mr. Porter means, of course. Under present conditions, only to the higher class of photo-dramas, exhibited to people of understanding, and accompanied by conscientious musicians; could this be applied. To advise its general acceptance is unwise, as too many pictures seem to call for nothing in particular. One might as well choose something of the same general character (or lack of character), and keep it going. In fact, there are times when it seems to "fall down" when the music stops. But again, this "all depends." What I was going to say was that too many musicians would sieze on Mr. Porter's proposition as an excuse for stalling—regardless of the dramatic character of their pauses.

When Mr. Porter says some managers "engage an orchestra—and endeavor to reap the benefit of extra expense by requiring the musicians to play continuously," I think it is a point well taken. I know a large part of the public like to hear good music, also there's no use in engaging an orchestra unless you use it. But there are limitations—or should be. How often we go expecting to see pictures accompanied by appropriate music, and are given an illustrated concert instead.

Lost, Strayed or Something Else.

What has become of some of the old-time contributors to our department? I haven't heard from H. R. Seeman, of New Orleans, for so long I'm afraid something has happened to him. Will H. Bryant went from Indianapolis to Terre Haute and then vanished. E. A. Dunn, Veola Thompson, P. C. H. Hummel and others must have gone into some other business or are too busy to write. I am going to call the roll pretty soon, and if you're not really absent, please stand up and say "present." Or say something, anyhow.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

DEVELOPMENTS of the past week showed that the trouble maker is still active in the motion picture ranks, handicapping the conservative manufacturers and the law-abiding exhibitors, as well as embarrassing those who are endeavoring to disprove the allegations of the chronic kickers who keep the business in a turmoil through their exaggerated presentments on the questions of decency and morality. Unfortunately, some of the mischief makers are kept alive by support accorded them by people who have a mistaken idea of what constitutes enterprise. In over-reaching themselves to outdo others in providing sensationalism they seem to become reckless to the point of desperation, and in addition to getting themselves into trouble with the authorities they bring unpleasant reflection upon the entire business.

One of the mischief makers gained unpleasant notoriety on a ferryboat by clashing with a deckhand who attempted to thwart him in what was supposed to be a foolhardy act. Of course, it was only a moving picture "stunt," similar to those performed every day by other companies, and possibly its performance in no way violated a law, or any rule of the company operating the ferry; but if the proper arrangements had been made the "stunt" would not have led to a clash between the performer and the boat crew. Such incidents may not result in serious consequences to those immediately concerned after explanations are made, but they are becoming so frequent there is reason to believe that certain privileges may be withheld from even companies who exercise common sense in staging thrillers.

This case brings to view the fact that most of the "dare-devils" who have made their way into the producing end of motion pictures have brought with them certain characteristics that need at least some curtailment. Many of them are braggadocios of a type that torments the officers of the law and tends to aggravate resentment against anything in motion picture form. They seem to feel that because they are willing to take their lives in their hands in order to enact a part for a motion picture production they are superior to any other being that exists and what they contract to do will be the greatest thing that ever happened in the making of motion pictures. And most of them, as well as the producers behind them, have the mistaken idea that the more police notoriety they get through the performance of their "stunt" the greater will be the success of the picture.

Immediately following the ferry incident comes a bridge-jumping "stunt" that brought out a police squad in boats to rescue the performer and place him under arrest. The jumper told the court he did not intend to make the leap—that it was his intention to "fake" it. The court evidently did not believe the story and found him guilty of disorderly conduct, but allowed him to go under suspended sentence. Now, wherein do any of these proceedings tend to uplift the motion picture business, which is aimed at and has been the aim of the those who wish to preserve a future for the business? Fakes and unlawful acts form the ammunition for the chronic assailants of motion pictures.

A well-known exhibitor, in commenting on the cases, said: "The fact that such 'stunts' are pulled off in the city of New York, where the chances for police interference are so much greater than they would be in some place of more privacy convinces me that they are planned for the purpose of getting advertising through arrests and police court trials. Many very good stories can be irredeemably marred by such tactics. It is a mistaken policy. My house would not stand for such productions. Half or more of my patrons are women and children and the shock caused by such scenes rebound on my interests. If the 'stunts' are 'fakes' the situation, while having a different color, is the same in effect. The motion picture patrons are so wise these days that it is very difficult to pass a 'fake' on them, and if they find it has been accomplished they come back to the exhibitor with the emphatic demand that 'fake' pictures be stopped under penalty of loss of patronage. The lines of reality must be closely adhered to in these days; but that does not mean the public sanctions the jeopardy of life to do so. It is true that in many very excellent picture plays of to-day there are scenes enacted in which the lives of players are apparently at stake and the situations are thrilling; but in the successful productions of this character the direction of keen minds and skillful hands has so well primed the action and situation of repulsive features that, intense as the interest may be, the audience still feels that it is only witnessing a play after all. I have been informed that some producers have sent out their 'dare-devil' performers with instructions to the effect—'We want to make this picture a hummer. Go out and do your stunt, and do it right.' If this is true, a halt should be called. Such performers figure their revenues on the amount of notoriety they can get and should not be given unlimited sway in picture work. Their field is the circus or the aeroplane fields, where people go to see those who challenge death."

Another unfavorable incident of the week in the metropolis was the arrest and conviction of a doorkeeper of a picture house for admitting a thirteen-year-old boy. The conviction was made in Special Sessions, where three justices preside. They gave the accused a sentence of twenty days and when his attorney pleaded that he be released on payment of a fine the court replied that the sentence should have been heavier. It was the first jail sentence imposed in this city on such a charge. May its effect be widespread. It should tend to make exhibitors careful in the selection of their employees. The offender not only violated the law personally, but placed his employer in an embarrassing position before the eyes of the license bureau. It is gratifying to know, however that the unjust policy of former years was not followed in this case. Instead of trying to close the theater on a complaint that children under the lawful age were admitted, the actual offender was penalized. But exhibitors must not relinquish their vigilance and depend upon the result of this case. Had the boy been found in the theater and the blame not been fixed on the doorkeeper, there would have been another story to tell.

The worst case on the list of the week's events is that of an exhibitor placed under bail charged with collecting a crowd. The police charge that at the entrance to his theater the exhibitor had a chair resembling the one used in the death-house of Sing Sing Prison. A dwarf, dressed as a convict, occupied the chair, and periodically fell back into it, simulating the writhing of a person paying the death penalty. The police also allege he would occasionally cry out: "This is how the gunmen are to be electrocuted." Meanwhile the exhibitor distributed handbills advertising the show in the theater. The dwarf is also under arrest. A manager who resorts to such a repulsive advertising scheme as this is deserving of the severest penalty the charge against him will carry and should be wiped out from the field of exhibitors. Such a violation of public decency places him in the ranks of those whom the respectable exhibitors have repeatedly condemned when under a blanket charge made by those who have not taken the pains to seek the real offenders. The case is another in support of the suggestion made in these columns that in the granting of licenses for motion picture houses the applicants should be carefully investigated in justice to the public and the reputable people who suffer in comparison with the class of people this heartless exhibitor represents.

Speaking of the recent decision in the Ohio censorship case a well-known lawyer of this city said: "There is no occasion for jubilation on either side to the controversy. The situation now is the same as it was before the decision was rendered. The decree merely forms a stepping-stone for entrance to the Supreme Court of the United States and until that court decides all concerned must wait. The censors created by the Ohio law cannot act because the court continued the temporary injunction pending the taking of an appeal, and as the appeal has been taken the injunction will no doubt be continued by the higher court pending the final result, I look for a reversal. While the opinion handed down with the decision was an exhaustive one, I do not think the court went sufficiently deep into the constiutional questions. As a rule, minor courts do not do this when it is evident either side will carry the case to the higher court. I think the Ohio Act will be declared discriminating because it does not cover all productions of a theatrical character."

One of the chief requisites for the successful operation of motion picture houses is perfect ventilation. A hint in this direction may appear to many as unnecessary, in view of the strict supervision given the theaters by the municipal authorities. Nevertheless there are some managers that have overlooked this feature. One large house frequently visited by the writer has a special plant for ventilating purposes and had it in operation during some of the coldest nights of the past winter, but one night last week not a whirl of a fan was heard, and that particular night the audience complained of the unusual warmth. An usher explained that the plant was out of order. Accidents of this character frequently happen at the most critical time, but audiences are often inconsiderate and too much care cannot be exercised to obviate complaints of such a character. It is very difficult to hold amusement patronage during the summer season and the manager who allows his patrons to get warm before that season arrives will have trouble to convince them when the mercury starts to climb, that "this auditorium is 20 degrees cooler than the atmosphere outside."

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Getting Up Copy.

GETTING up copy for a program is one of the things that holds a lot of managers back from getting out their own sheet. About the easiest way of getting up copy is to hire some newspaper man to come in and do it for you, but sometimes an available man cannot be found, and sometimes expense is an obstacle. Most managers are busy men and they let the work wait until the last moment and then slave and sweat over the work where a little systematic work would help a lot. Why not systematize your work?

Perhaps the hardest part of the job is the synopses. Do this in your spare moments. If you take a certain service, put each synopsis in the form you use it on a sheet of cheap copy paper. Either cut and paste the printed synopsis you find in the paper or, better still, write your own version that leaves the end untold. Copy off the lines from the advertising that you think will help you, and mark down the company and the date. When you get advertising from the manufacturers add the details of the cast or at least the leading players. Use the upper half of the sheet for the synopsis as it should appear in your program. Use the lower half for the other notes and repeat the title, company and date on this lower half of the sheet. File these alphabetically, using either the arch file board or the box letter files.

When you get the various house organs clip what you want to use. Paste the stuff you must use at once on certain sheets and the stuff you can use almost any old time, each on a separate sheet. File these latter in a box or on the arch. Do it as soon as you have the time after the matter comes in.

Now when you get your program from the exchange turn to your synopsis file and take out the titles you will need. Here you have copy all ready for the printer.

Cut off the upper halves, arrange them by days. At the top of the first sheet for the first day write whatever matter leads off your program and then mark this "Program, page 1." On the second sheet, the sheet giving the second synopsis for the first day, write "Program—2" and so on, until you have handled all of the synopses for the week. The printer will understand this is for the program proper. Send this down to him, to let him get started on something.

Now take the lower halves of these pages. If you have entered up in sufficient detail you have all the material you need to suggest the catch lines for your display advertising, interlines, etc. Now write your squibs about the coming attractions, take the matter that should be run at once, and which you have already pasted up, add as much other matter as you think you'll need, and send it all down. You have already told the printer about how you want the stuff to run each week; the standard form. He'll put the type into pages, send you the proof and you'll have it back quickly. Instead of spending several hours when you may be busy, you have taken perhaps an hour all told. The rest of the time you have taken from your more leisurely moments, and you'll do the rush work all the better because you are not harassed by the detail stuff that takes up valuable time. Much of the matter the stuff you are going to use, gossip of the players and that sort of thing, can be put into type several days in advance of the rush matter and be entirely out of the way, and this will help the printer to get the job out more quickly.

Put a little system into your program work and you'll be surprised to see how easy it is. Even where you do not care to go to the trouble of getting up special sheets you may not use, you'll find that it helps a lot to get as much matter as possible into type before the rush comes. If you, as so many do, get your material from this paper, and it gets to your town on Tuesday, don't wait until Friday to send in the matter to be used in your Saturday program. Send it in Tuesday or Wednesday, and the matter can be set when the printers would otherwise be idle. Talk it over with the foreman of the printing office, and let him help you to help him to help you.

Making a Choice.

The Princess Theater, Southern Pines, N. C., offers something new in a vote week. Three reels each of Mutual and Universal pictures are to be run at most of the performances for a week and the audience will be asked to evince a preference for one or the other service by means of ballots supplied with the tickets. The program is evenly divided as to the number of reels and merit of the subject and this seems to be a novel way of solving a vexed problem.

The house uses an odd idea in a card cover and a four-page white insert. We do not altogether like it. The cover stock is too stiff. Something that can be rolled or folded and carried home without hurt is much better, and this card is too stiff to handle nicely. Outside of this the program is good for its size and not only carries a descriptive program for a full week, but all the coming features for the season. They even have the space for three advertisements, as well.

Bleich In Line.

George A. Bleich sends in his first program and writes that he is not asking praise but criticism. He adds that he is going to get a plate for the cover and is going to try and "get away from the hackneyed synopsis stuff."

The issue is eight pages of handy size with a greeting on the first page and the rest given over to the announcement of the programs, a page a day. The type page is four and a half inches wide, twice too wide to be easily read. It is all right for the titles and the casts, which are given when handy, but we think that it would be better to run the programs two to the page and these on the right hand, or odd numbered pages, the even numbered pages being given to straight reading matter about the house and the coming attractions. The "hackneyed synopsis stuff" is not apt to be hackneyed to the reading public of a small town, and they may enjoy it, but a synopsis is bad in that it robs the story of suspense by telling what the finish is before it is shown. A descriptive line or two is much better than the full story. Mr. Bleich gives the hint and piques curiously and then stops.

The program is well worded and displayed, but it lacks the intimate touch of personality that Mr. Bleich gives to his newspaper advertising. Take this line, for instance, advertising "A Lady of Quality" and "Comedy and Tragedy": "And beware! It is not promised that this show will please every one! But every lover of the artistic—the beautiful, the charming will be highly delighted and count it a rare treat."

These are exceptional offerings and the caution is well worded. The program as yet lacks this touch. We think that it will be added when Mr. Bleich gets used to being a regular editor. It's a splendid chance to talk up his house in the way he has; a way we have often exampled in this department.

The main point is that he has swung into line with the program.

Changing Over.

Always something doing down in Selma, where the Academian has gone over from a sixteen-pager to a four. It uses just as much paper and just as much type, but it saves a lot of folding and the wire stitching and still further gains the advantage of looking more like a "regular newspaper." It also announces a vote on Mutual versus Licensed service. It would seem that some Mutual exchange down in the Southeast is getting busy after business.

Neat and Startling.

It doesn't exactly belong, but we've got to take notice of an advertisement sent in by the Consolidated Film and Supply Co., Memphis. It seems that the Princess Theater, of that city, sent the exchange an extra check for $100, because the service was so extra good. Then the exchange spent the hundred in an advertisement. In a gray cover are bound in six sheets of paper, each of a different color and each a little larger than the one on top of it, so that all of the sheets show as the cover is opened, the margins being about three-sixteenths of an inch. At once the eye is caught and held by this color display. The top sheet carries a reproduction of the check, the second some text, the third a reproduction of the letter, more text, the picture of the house and again letter press. It is a unique advertisement of a most unusual happening.

Another "Poor Conditions."

Here is another letter from a man who is trying to keep out of the way of the elephant and who seems to have been pretty successful up to now. He writes:

> Your advice, entitled "Poor Conditions," page 1673, March 28th issue of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, to some poor exhibitor that is in need of help nearly as bad as I am, caused me to think that perhaps you could help me.
> This picture show was started one year ago next month, and was the first successful one. We have a new big opera house which has only been built about two years, and is owned by a number of business men and farmers, all of whom are Catholic Knights. When the picture show was started it was put in a store building because rent was too high in the opera house. Business was always good for this picture show, but was thought to be making much more than it really did, as people overestimated the crowds in a small house.
> Last November a man, green in the picture show business, from some other town, rented the opera house for pictures. However, the opera house people gave the owner of the picture house the tip and he paid them $300 to keep the other out until he could dispose of the picture show. I bought (in November) this store show, knowing the conditions, thinking it would only be a short time until he would quit. He lasted two months. Left his machine to help pay the rent. But, here's the trouble: the opera people took hold of it. They have found out since that they haven't nearly the swing they thought they had because they were Catholic Knights. However, I think the real reason is because the business is not as big as they thought and people don't like a big house when there are only a few in it.
> Our house has kept up remarkably well, everything considered, but a person needs all the business to make anything.
> They use the opera house for dances and road shows. It has a flat floor. We have an inclined floor and use our place for pictures only. At first both houses ran three reels, then we raised to four; they put on four then we put on five; they raised us one and put on six. They charge adults 10c; children 5c. We charge 10c straight and get lots of kids at that. We run six for two or three days, saw our mistake and dropped down to four. They still run six. We still get the best of the business by a long ways and they are losing money fast. The question is, how long will they be willing to lose? I can sell this show to people of this town for more than invoice value, but I would be loser at that; nevertheless, this shows they can't run the little show out. This town is only 1,500, and out of the question for two shows. Both shows run seven nights a week with Saturday matinee. Change a program every night and use piano and drums for music. Projection about the same. Our music and choice of films are the best. We both use Licensed films, and both eight-month stuff. They run vaudeville with four reels of pictures. We use a six-piece orchestra on those nights, but, of course, I don't get out of it without losing. However, I haven't taken a wallop at the vaudeville as yet, but will the next time they use it.

Both shows get out dodgers every day except Sundays. Enclosed you will find two of them. They are the first slams I have taken at the opera house. I am told by some of the friends of both houses that I should cut that kind of talk, as I will make some of the Catholic friends of my house sore on me. Although I am a Protestant, I have many Catholic friends who want to see my show stay.

They don't have to pay rent (since they own it), but their expense is greater than mine at that, and they are losing heavily. They hire an operator who tends to most all of the work.

If you ever find time to read this I would be very pleased to receive your excellent advice on how to make them close quick.

Don't Get Personal.

We are afraid that our correspondent has been getting too personal. One of the advertisements reads:

Judging from the number of people that patronize the —— —— is not yet controlled by a few who seek to close this show. Evidently the public doesn't like the boycotting business. If they got a dose of their own medicine they might not think it is so pleasant, and remember those liberal in their dealings with others will be found liberal in their dealings with you.

Now, it does not appear that the larger house is trying to boycott the smaller, and they have a perfect right to run pictures in the opera house if they want to. The conditions objected to in the earlier article had reference to a groceryman who made his clerks work in the picture show in the evening and who wrapped up a free ticket with every dollar's worth of goods.

Here is merely a question of two houses in one town and the survival of the fittest. It does not appear that the opera house people are urging patrons to boycott the other house, and talk of boycott and oppression will not make sympathy for the claimant, but rather for the other side.

The situation here is one of open and apparently straightforward competition with the monetary advantage on one side and the business on the other. The moneyed people can last longer in a fight to the death.

Doing It Right.

The fight should be made on the fact that one is a picture show run by a picture man and the other is not. Don't say the other fellows are trying to run you out of business. Say:

Don't Be Lonesome.

Follow the crowd and you'll land in a comfortable seat in the PRINCESS

That's where the knowing ones go because they know that the house is run by a regular photoplay manager and not an experimenter. We don't know how to run a bank, but running a photoplay theater right is something we DO know.

Get the most for your money.

Work along those lines. Explain that running a photoplay theater is your special and particular business; that your house was specially built for the showing of photoplays under the most advantageous conditions. Don't say flat-footed that the other man is a fool, but by inference, make them feel that you are the only real photoplay manager in town.

And then prove it.

This correspondent admits that he started in to boost the number of reels, so he has no grounds for a kick there. Better reels, rather than more of them, would have been the better plan.

For the Program Brigade.

Eugene O'Keefe, of the Luna Theater, Billings, Montana, is going to come into the ranks of program publishers. Will you other fellows be nice again and shoot yours into Mr. O'Keefe, who seems to be a live wire in a lively town. If he gets out a program that is as neat as his letterhead it is going to be a good one.

Easy.

A correspondent writes that he is running the only fireproof theater in his town, the others being firetraps heated by coal stoves. He wants to know why the Fire Inspector is so strict with some and not with others.

We didn't suppose that there was a man who had never heard of a political pull, and this looks like a matter of pull.

And kicking is not going to help any. The only thing to do is to stand for it and educate the public to the appreciation of the fact that your house is fireproof. Don't talk of the others. Next election get some influential friend to get after the editor of the newspaper of the opposite political affiliation and urge him to ask why the ——— party's Fire Inspector is so lax and what's the matter with the Mayor that he permits such things. That's about the only way.

Uses Slides.

Clay and Cropper, of the Comique Theater, Jamesport, Mo., are making business with slides of local people and happenings. The other day bloodhounds were brought to town to track down some robbers and the slides the same evening were the talk of the town. An electric fan and some wood alcohol will do a lot toward getting slides out quickly. Ever try it?

To pay back for this item they are advised that the poem they speak of would have small chance of reaching the film, even if done into proper photoplay form. Stories of the Vikings cost more to film than they generally are worth. Head off that patron.

Worked Up.

John H. Heinz, of the Gem theater, Baltimore, sends in a bunch of programs that grew from a rather inconspicuous circular. Mr. Heinz writes that he is handicapped by the fact that he uses second run and the copy must go to the printer so early that he cannot always get the synopses. We do not like the idea of using the full synopsis.

The first program was a four pager, three columns to the page inside and one day's program to the column. Later this built up to eight pages with the programs on the third and seventh pages. Lately they have taken to running a "continued" story, giving three columns a week and running for several weeks on the same short story.

does not interest. It may save typesetting, if they buy it in the plate,

This is an absolute waste of space. It may fill up the program but it would be better to pay composition cost and get something of real interest. In this day of ten and fifteen cent magazines no one is going to spend four or five weeks reading one short story, and with the press matter supplied and this columns of the paper to draw from there is plenty of photoplay material to be had.

The programs should be run on the third and fifth pages, where they will show. That, it is to be presumed, is what the program is gotten out for.

They made a good start, but the editor got the hookworm or the spring fever.

Using Kalem Dirt.

This picture of the Dome theater, Youngstown, Ohio, is the first to come in showing the use of Kalem Irish soil. The house made the most of it's chance, by all appearances, but as the picture came without further details, that is all we know.

Naughty, Naughty?

Some overheated Philadelphia correspondent, who does not sign his name, writes to call us a liar because we said that a certain house on Market street advertised one double reel and showed another. If the feverish one will ask the proprietor of the Family Theater, on Market, just below the City Hall, if he didn't shoot back "The Drama in Hayville" and still advertise that for about half an hour while he was getting the paper for "Sealed Orders," he'll probably be told that he did. Another house lately advertised "Traffic in Souls" in advance, advertised "Hearts Adrift" the day of showing and ran "Tess" on the screen.

Logis.

The Star Theater, Two Harbors, Minn., sends in a folder based on one sent him by Thomas Furniss, of the Rex, Duluth. This originally appeared in the Academian, Selma, but between them Mr. Furniss and Mr. Murphy have simplified the phrasing. This will better suit some houses, so it is given again.

A short time ago one of our patrons said, "Why do you always advance the prices when you get an exceptionally good picture? Isn't a picture a picture, no matter what it is? I can't see any difference."

That is poor logic. You pay 75c for a phonograph record, but you don't expect to get one sung by Caruso or Melba for that price. Your dealer will charge you from $4 to $6 for such a record. You might say, a record is a record, but nobody says it. There is absolutely no difference between the two cases. A picture is no more a picture than a record is a record when quality is considered.

Mr. Murphy also sends an excellent dodger from the Rex which included Mr. Furniss' form, which is more elaborate than his own.

Small, But——

Ernest J. Kimball, of the Granite Square theater, Manchester, N. H., sends a small program, explaining that the printer made is even smaller than he intended. Until he gets out a "regular" program the little folder will be better than a larger one. It is clean cut and simple. The only change suggested is a bold type for titles.

Mr. Kimball is thinking of getting out a large program and will appreciate some samples from the kind hearted.

The Limit.

In Vancouver they have a theater that runs five reels of pictures and advertises two for five cents. As Vancouver has no pennies in circulation, they take your nickel and give you a check good for the next day, and the firm has five houses run on this plan! It is murderous suicide.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

At the Ed-Au.

POP HOADLEY, long may he live—is now the president of the Ed-Au club, with Arthur Leeds and James Cogan as vice-presidents, Monte Katterjohn as secretary and A. Van Buren Powell holding on to the $3.50 that represents the club treasury.

All this happened at Keene's Chop House Saturday evening, April 4, when Phil Lang laid down the gavel in compliance with the by-laws and heaved a sigh of relief.

Arthur D. Hotaling, just up from Florida to hire a third company, was present as a guest and quit a member. He spoke of conditions in Jacksonville and advanced the argument that each director should have two script writers, one to be with the director watching the production of the script he had written, while the second author remained in the office to write the next script when he would assist the director with the production while the first wrote a third; the idea being that the presence of the author at the taking of each scene would give the most perfect production. In proof of his theory he pointed to a release of that day wherein a single bit of business destroyed the logical value of the climax.

Another interesting point was raised by Monte Katterjohn, who said that he had noted that the regular magazine writer was more apt to be satisfied with standard prices than the newcomer. A former magazine man present explained that the $50 a reel price was better pay, considering the time and care required than $100 for a 5,000 word story, and that few received more than two cents a word. His own experience had been that it did not now pay him to write magazine stories.

President Lang spoke of the better tone of the market for the big original idea.

James Cogan spoke of the falling market for adaptations, and Lu Senarens, of Motion Picture Stories, spoke of the relation of the author to the fiction version of his story.

These new members were taken in: Mrs. Louella O. Parsons, editor for Essanay, and Mrs. Emily Brown Heininger, of that staff, Miss Marguerite Bertsch, the Vitagraph editor, Mrs. Catherine Carr, the editor of the North American, Lloyd Lonergan, the Thanhouser editor, Raymond Schrock, the editor for the Gene Gauntier Company, Mrs. Mary Louise Farley, Cornelius O'Shea, James F. Poland, Eugene Mullins, of the Vitagraph. William Alfred Corey and Mrs. Isobel M. Reynolds.

Applications for membership and all other matters pertaining to the club should be addressed to the new secretary, Monte Katterjohn, in care of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, Mecca Building, New York City.

Copyright.

William Lord Wright has supplied us with a copy of the bill that Congressman Willis, at his instance, has introduced into the House. Mr. Willis is versed in the ways of Congress. Instead of amending the two clauses in the present bill that create specific classifications for motion pictures of photoplays and other than photoplays; the classifications being lettered "j" and "m," he goes up to "d" with his joker. The present law reads:

(d) Dramatic or dramatico-musical compositions.

The amendment reads:

(d) Dramatic or dramatico-musical compositions, including the brief synopsis, sketch, or scenario, or the descriptions of the characters and actions to be depicted by motion-picture photoplays.

If this gets past the committee you can copyright almost anything from a three-line synopsis up.

Mail Matters.

Theory is one thing and fact is quite another. Here is a story on mailing scripts written by a postal clerk who is also a photoplay writer. He has been on the road so long he can almost tell by the smell of a letter addressed to Uniontown, Pennsylvania, which of the two Uniontowns in that state it should go to. We are not altogether in accord with his theories about No. 9 envelopes; not that he does not represent the postoffice conditions, but because we think that, as a rule, the use of a No. 9 envelope is not to be advised for other reasons. The script must be exactly folded to fit into a No. 9, and this exact folding is seldom done, with the result that the script rises too high and a part of the gummed flap attaches itself to the script. But it's all good advice and stuff you can't learn unless you know the ropes as well as a man who has passed his "examinations" for half the states in the union, which is some little job and argues a high grade of intelligence.

Although the article is printed without signature, the writer is well known to us and to editors, as well.

The common impression that the ignorant and uneducated are responsible for most of the errors in the mailing of letters is a huge mistake. The ignorant fellow knows that he is ignorant and usually asks for information. Moreover, his very ignorance makes him careful, and carelessness is responsible for most of our "nixies." I daily stick into the "nixie" box from 10 to 250 pieces and at least 75% of them bear evidence of having come from educated and intelligent people who think they know and don't. It is for this 75% that I am writing this article in order to give them a little peep into the inner circle of Uncle Sam's great system which shall uncover some of the whys and wherefores of things.

Are you aware that very little mail goes into New York City, or, for that matter, into any large city, without having first received city distribution on the train? When a big R. P. O. (Railway Post Office) rolls into New York the letter mail and most of the paper mail, also, is carefully separated to stations and much of it separated to carriers and box sections in these stations. The R. P. O. clerks who do city distribution for a city like New York know the city just like you know your back yard. If you mail a letter for a big firm and omit street and number the chances are at least 1,000 to 1 that it will go home safely and quickly.

But let us suppose that when the train pulls out of Philadelphia, they find the mail unusually heavy. Only two short hours' run to New York and they face the possibility of going "stuck." Working desperately to clean up, a clerk comes to your letter addressed, Thomas A. Edison (Inc.), New York, N. Y.—no street address. He thinks he knows that firm and sticks the letter—to the wrong station. The chances are that the station will shoot the letter safely home, but—why take the chance? Why not put the street address on and not make a gamble of it? It is an easy matter to secure a list of studio addresses and no one has any excuse for taking the chance. Put on the street address, just beneath the firm name, and if you have any office directions such as "Attention, Mr. Boles" or "Manuscript Dept.," put it over at the lower left hand corner of your envelope—don't mix it with the regular address, which is for postal clerks only.

Type your address when possible. Aside from any influence which the business-like address may have on an editor, the typed address cannot easily be mistaken. A day in the dispatching case would teach you very clearly that Me. can be written to look like Mo., la. very much like La., not to mention Miss and Minn and Cal and Col and a dozen other similarities. The typed address pays.

I do not believe that anyone at all accustomed to use of the mails would send a letter out without the return address in the upper left hand corner. Surely this is tempting Providence, for this address is of value in so many ways that I have not room to explain half of them. It insures immediate return for correction of any errors of address or failure to affix postage; it acts as a safeguard in any case of failure to deliver; it is a sign to an editor that the writer is careful and methodical; and in a hundred and one other ways it safeguards the writer against the possibility of loss. There is no excuse except laziness for the failure to put on the return address and laziness wins no prizes in the writing game.

Postage.

Let me explain to you how much trouble "Postage due" is. A clerk in the dispatching case is working along at a nice little clip and he comes to a letter that "hefts" heavy. He stops his work, lays the letter on the scales, weighs it, lays it on the ledge, takes a rubber stamp and stamps the amount due on it and then he sticks the letter. This is only the beginning of things. It arrives at its destination and is stuck, not directly to the carrier, but to a clerk who affixes postage due stamps and collects the amount from the carrier. The carrier must then collect it before he delivers the letter, and if he does not find you at home or if you haven't the money for him he cannot afford to keep accounts—you get your letter when you pay. What a lovely job it is for a carrier to lug that letter around for a week while you are out of town.

Swear off! Never again be guilty of a "postage due." Most companies will refuse a short paid manuscript. It hurts a man more to pay two cents postage due than it does to lose five dollars on a poker game. He feels that he has been skinned by the other fellow and with loaded dice. Anyone can easily see that this is not the attitude of mind which you wish an editor to have toward you. Put on the full postage. It pays. And while the subject is up let me advise that you put the full postage on your return envelope. What if it does come back with the check and you find you have wasted two or four cents. I have yet to feel any vain regrets over such wasted postage. The advantage of prompt service is all with the full-paid letter and you cannot afford to lose this advantage.

But a special delivery stamp on your envelope is ten cents wasted. I do not think it hurries an editor one minute in its consideration and I believe that he resents the implied little prod for haste. I would. The special delivery only secures delivery by a special messenger on arrival at destination; the letter does not travel any faster nor receive any quicker dispatch than any other letter. The special delivery does not protect you in case of loss, in fact, it gives you no valuable service whatever in submitting a script for studio consideration.

Envelopes.

The first and last words in envelopes is to use standard sizes.

Do you know how mail is fixed up for dispatch? The mailing clerk sticks up his standard size letters in a case. Some boxes are for states, some for cities and some for R. P. O.'s. When it comes time for dispatch to a train, the clerk takes strong jute twine and ties these letters in packages, with a label on each. Now, suppose that at St. Louis, you mail a letter in a No. 10 envelope for New York. It goes into a package of New York longs. There are probably fifty other letters in this package. What chance has your letter to receive damage protected and supported by these other letters? But suppose you use a wide envelope of odd size. The clerk has no others of that size to go with it and it must go it alone. Into the pouch it goes and the 50 or 60 bales of letters in there begin to get busy crunching it. By the time it reaches its destination it has been bent and twisted and crushed till it looks like it had flirted with the tail end of a Kansas zephyr. When the editor returns it to you, you wonder what tribe of Indians fought over it and—rewrite it.

But a No. 9, 10, or 11 envelope is standard size and when of the weight of government stamped envelopes is perfectly safe from damage in the mails. Folded in thirds (to fold in thirds fold script one-third of way from top to bottom, then again two-thirds of way from top to bottom), a script of as high as 12 sheets of standard size letter typing paper fits snugly in a No. 9. The folding must be done carefully, but I recently dispatched a 17-page script (16 pound bond) in a No. 9 and it fit perfectly. This No. 9 is for a return envelope. The address envelope is a No. 10 and the No. 9 with its enclosure fits snugly into the No. 10. This matter of snugness of fit is of value because of cancelling machines.

Of course, you have noticed the postmark and little parallel lines which cancel the stamp and have wondered how they were put on. It is done with a machine, driven by power, usually electric, and it cancels and postmarks very rapidly. All letters are "faced up" with the stamps all one way and are fed into the machine. Clerks keep close watch for letters with plugs or bumps in them in order that they may not go into this machine, for when they do there is usually a short argument, a rip and a tear and the result is a vast dissolution of continuity—for the letter. An ordinary script fits loosely in a No. 10 envelope so as to make a sort of a bump in the envelope, and this gives the machine a chance to act up. But a No. 9 holds your script snugly and feeds into the machine as smoothly as apple sauce into a farmhand. When the script is too large for a No. 9 the number 10 is all right, for then the package will be so big that there will be no effort to cancel it in the machine—it will be done by hand.

By the way, if you want a No. 9 and a No. 10 government stamped envelope, you must ask for a No. 7 and a No. 8, for the No. 7 government stamped envelope is a commercial No. 9, and the No. 8 is a commercial No. 10.

Flimsy envelopes! Who invented them? And why didn't he die before he gave this legacy of trouble to the public? Flimsy envelopes are light—yes. And they are so weak and frail that they ought to excite pity—but they don't. They are a nuisance to the sender, to Uncle Sam, to the addressee. Cancelling machines love 'em, they hunger and thirst after 'em, they chew 'em! Clerks watch for them so closely that very few ever get into the machine, but when they do, it is a sure sign that the sender is going to get a letter from the D. L. O. If it is a script enclosed in the pitiful thing it is also a sign that someone is going to rewrite a script. Envelopes of the weight of the government stamped article are the very lightest that should ever be used and if any odd size is used, a much heavier grade of strong manilla or linen should be selected. The business man knows this, and when he has to use an odd size he gets them heavy and strong, for he knows that they must go it alone and need strength.

Don't be afraid to ask for information. The system is so big that it is no disgrace for anyone not to know it all. In any P. O. in the land you will find clerks who will be glad to run down information for you if they do not know it off-hand. Bless you, that's the way they make their bread and butter. It is worse than foolish for anyone to take a chance rather than display a little ignorance of a system as big as Uncle Sam's postal business. Ask, and you shall find out.

Synopses Only.

Russell E. Smith, of the Mutual Film Corporation, takes up the matter of his chief and synopses. It will be remembered that we opined that Phil Mindil and not "Spec" wrote the article on scripts that was credited to Frank E. Woods. Mr. Smith, speaking by the book, writes:

> The article which you say you believe to be the work of a press agent was actually written by "Spec" and is veracious in every particular. Of course the synopsis idea is only for the benefit of the tyro whose work is seldom available beyond the idea, so that is why we prefer the synopsis. In case of authors who know how to write a script we do not ask for the synopsis only. We have been paying as high as $50 for synopses only. Also note your comment that no "regular" author would submit synopses only. Roy McCardell does just that, as do one or two others.

And yet we hold, with Lawrence McCloskey, that the novice is just the one who should be encouraged to write the full script, that he may learn. The script, in most cases, is useless, but the training to the author is invaluable.

We were under the impression that Mr. McCardell made full working scripts, but in spite of that we still maintain that the "honest-to-goodness-regular-author" does not try to sell by sample save when he is testing out his ideas on a story ordered, and desires to see if he has caught the right idea.

The main point of all this is that Mutual is paying some pretty fancy prices for real ideas, but it must be an idea that measures up to the high standard Reliance now sets.

Because.

A writer wants to know why it was that this department had nothing about the recent Edison fire. It's painfully simple. The matter was fully covered in the regular news way and there was no use saying the same thing twice. Read all the paper.

Ask Questions.

The Inquiry Column of this department is for anyone who wants to ask questions that deal with technical points. Please feel free to use it as frequently as you wish. You are not troubling the editor when you ask sane questions. That's one of the things he is here for.

Envelopes.

A correspondent wants to know why it is that all instructors advise the use of ten and eleven envelopes where the post office list gives the size of the nine as 3 9/16 by 4⅝ inches, and the tens as 4¼ by 5½.

It is supposed that the person who has sufficient intelligence to write scripts has also sufficient intelligence to understand that other than the post office authorities handle envelopes; indeed most authorities add a word of warning against white envelopes, which is all the post office sells.

When No. 10 and No. 11 envelopes are mentioned the standard commercial envelope, to be had of all stationers, is meant. These sizes are of the proper measurement to take the script in the No. 10 with plenty of room and this in turn will go into the No. 11 without folding. At a pinch No. 9 and No. 10 can be made to do, but this is better.

Don't get white envelopes, and do not get envelopes ready stamped. Get a good manila or kraft envelope and if you can afford it get them by the thousand or half thousand. In large lots a first-class envelope can be had for $2 and $2.50 per thousand for the two sizes. The envelope that costs twenty cents a hundred in 500 lots may cost the same sum a pack of twenty-five when purchased retail.

Same Old Stuff.

We have been keeping count and since the first of the year we have received 129 inquiries looking to the placing of adaptations. Just once more we are going to remark that this is foolish.

Every studio has at least one person who has the ability to write good technical stuff. Some companies have from three to a dozen technical men. These men can make a better technical arrangement of a standard or copyrighted work than any outside writer possibly could, because the studio man knows precisely what that particular studio wants. He cannot only make the adaptation in good technique, but he can swing the story to the exact needs of the studio. Why, in the name of common sense, should a studio hire Jim Hicks, of Hicksville, Alaska, to make an adaptation of the story of Moses in the Bullrushes from the Bible, when they have a man under salary who can do the work better and more quickly.

The 129th inquiry sought a market for "Thelma," which has been done by Selig and Reliance, and "The Magic Skin," which was last done by Victor January 5th last, and which has been filmed four other times that we recall.

The only reason why companies accept stuff from outsiders is that the outsider can think up original combinations, and it is the original thought only that there is a demand for.

If you can't think your own ideas, you are not an author. Please go away from here.

One Reason.

Lately we had an argument with a man who reasoned that it was not possible that only an average of two per cent. of scripts were available. Then William Wright, of the Kalem Company, shared this letter with us:

> Owing to the great demand I see for photo Plays, I do hereby ask of you to send me particulars regarding same. I have never wrote any before, don't no you want them, But I have some in my mind that I think would make exciting films from beginning to end. State which kind you want best, "Comedies," "Drama," "Robbery or Murder Stories."

These are they who keep the average down to two per cent. They know, from a perusal of the lying school advertisements, that there is a great demand for plays and that "anyone" can write them. Most of them send in the plays without first asking for particulars. The other day we got the synopsis of a seven-reel historical drama in about 600 words. There is plenty of room at the top, but too many are digging down to get to the top.

Better Prices.

Better prices come with better work. It is absurd to argue that a combination of authors can raise prices. Look at the White Rats. That was a vaudeville body organized to keep prices up and prevent evils. They had a strike, failed and came to life again, and most of the Rats are playing four shows a day instead of two and for less money and yet they have the whole Federation of Labor back of them. It is good work and not organized demand that will bring the better pay to the brain worker.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

W. B. C.—Motion Picture Operators are affiliated with the I. A. T. S. E. Almost any operator or stage hand can tell you how to get in touch with the local in your town.

E. M. S.—It is the contention of this department that photoplay writing cannot be taught by mail, therefore, we recommend no such system. For your second inquiry see last week's issue.

H. W. S.—Death, the sight of the corpse, the suggestion of the corpse or the showing or suggestion of the funeral is not comedy material. A cut in leader referring to a death in order to lead up to a dispute over a will is not close enough to the actual suggestion of death to hurt, for here the squabble over the will is the comedy idea and not death itself. You see a lot of rules violated in screened productions, even as you suggest, but this should not lead you to follow a bad example.

H. S.—You have not caught the idea exactly. The synopsis of a story is read. If it does not interest, the story is returned. If it indicates promising material, the action is carefully studied, and no editor would accept a story without looking at the action. The synopsis is like the newspaper headlines. You do not read the entire paper, but such items as interest you. What these items are you judge from the headlines. In the same way the editor reads the synopsis to see what the story is about. If it is about something that interests him, he reads the action to get the full details. It is not necessary to make a special request that he read the action. He will do so as a matter of course if the synopsis even hints as comedy possibilities.

PRINCE.—Can't give the players in foreign-made films.

E. B.—Address Miss Huff, in care of the Lubin Company.

C. C. B.—Nothing has "become" of Miss Normand. Still with Keystone. Mr. Sterling is already with the Universal.

W. B. V.—Miss Pickford's address is in care of the Famous Players. We believe that she is in Los Angeles, at present, but a letter to the New York address will reach her.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturers Notice.

IT IS an established rule of the Moving Picture World and of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of our staff. In case of apparatus pertaining to projection this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps, will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you can't answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 29 (A Most Important One.)

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Suppose your employer purchased a motor-generator set, for which the seller claimed 80 per cent. efficiency. Tell us what is meant by "80 per cent. efficiency," and how you would proceed to test the set, and discover whether or not the maker's claim holds good. Show how you obtain your answer by assuming the voltage and amperage, and figuring it out for us.

Roll of Honor on Question No. 23.

The Roll of Honor on Question 23 is comprised of W. S. James, Camden, N. J.; L. B. Minges, Lestershire, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill. (2); Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada; Boston, Mass.; Jos. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; and Seattle, Wash., all of whom sent in fairly good replies—some of them very good indeed. The reply of L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada, has been selected for publication.

Reply to Question No. 23.

By L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada.

The question:

Suppose one of your armature coils burned in two, or became disconnected right in the middle of a show. Tell us what you would do; also, give probable cause of the trouble. Explain, in detail, the things which might cause a compound-wound generator to refuse to pick up its load, even though running mechanically perfect.

The answer:

When an armature coil becomes either disconnected or broken, violent sparking and flaming at the brushes will follow. This will actually occur only when the bar that is connected to the broken coil passes under the brushes, but it may look like a ring of flame clear around the commutator. In case of such trouble occurring during the show a temporary remedy may be effected. Stop the machine and examine the commutator. The bar fed by the broken coil can generally be located by the black, sooty-looking spots on opposite sides of the commutator. See that the coil connection to the commutator proper is not loose or disconnected.

Temporary remedy: Select the next two commutator bars either side of the "dead bar". Find the risers or wires connected to them, and clean or bare them about half an inch, just above the commutator. Now take 3 or 4 inches of bare copper wire, about No. 12 gauge, that being easily bent and able to carry a fairly heavy load temporarily. Connect the two risers from the bars, together with the wire, and see that by revolving the armature the temporary connection will not strike anywhere. This remedy will short-circuit the dead coil, and reduce the sparking, though it will not stop it entirely. The voltage will be erratic, but not bad, and the damage to the commutator by the arcing will be greatly lessened. The armature should be taken out at the first opportunity and the break fixed. The temporary short-circuit thus established will cause the coils to heat. When the armature is taken out of the machine for permanent repair, remove temporary short and test as follows: Fix up tester as per sketch fig. 1 and run the two straps slowly around the commutator while watching the ammeter. When the ammeter shows a very much lower reading, the coil connected between those two bars is the broken one. The probable cause of the trouble: (a) Defective wire in an armature coil. (b) A nick or straightened out kink which has finally broken down. (c) Momentary heavy overload, destroying the conductivity of the wire, or causing rupture in the insulation. (d) Poorly constructed armature. (e) Insulation break-down and grounding, leading to possible internal arcing and burning. (f) Dampness; leaking and grounding; overheating. (g) Mechanical injury during installation or handling of machine, causing injury to become apparent after use. It is always well to have an outside source of current all ready to cut in by throwing a switch, as per fig. 43 of the handbook.

The refusal of a compound-wound generator to pick up the load, although running mechanically perfect, may be caused by any of the following: Fuse contacts or wire contacts in loose or in bad condition. Wrong connections to load (See diagram 2). Broken connections in either field or armature. Test separately with a magneto. Brushes not making good electrical contact with commutator. Residual magnetism either destroyed or too weak, caused either by current being sent through the field coils in the wrong direction, a shock, bad vibration of the machine, generator located too close to another generator or motor. May be re-magnetized by sending a current through the coils in proper direction. Trouble may also be due to reversed poles or wrong connections of field windings. Poles should be in rotation, north and south when read around the frame. Test with a compass. Wrong direction of armature rotation—reverse direction. Too much resistance in field circuit, cut out as much as possible, taking care not to cause short-circuit. Heavy overload on short-circuit. With voltmeter showing full voltage if, when the line switch is closed, the fuses blow or circuit breakers kick-out there is either a heavy overload or short circuit on the line side. Figure out roughly the amount of current being used on the load and see if it coincides with the ammeter reading when the breaker kicked out, or see if fuses are to capacity of machine. If they are blown and no short is found on system, then the load must be decreased somewhere. Locate short and remove same. If the generator still refuses to pick up the load there may be an internal short or ground. Armature coils either grounded, shorted or broken, refuse to maintain the voltage. Field coils grounded, shorted, burnt out, or broken; either no current in the coils or else very little owing to ground. Test with a magneto. Single ground is will not affect, but grounds on both sides of the system will set up trouble, the machine becoming loaded with an absolute waste power leakage. Brushes not set in right position. Position of brushes on a commutator vary according to conditions, armature winding, etc. The brushes can be so placed that they will not pick up any current of value whatever. If set too far forward that will lower the voltage. They should be set slightly back against direction of rotation. Generally manufacturers cut a mark on the frame for approximately the best position, but shifting slightly will sometimes be advisable under varying load conditions.

Best Ever.

Texas orders a set of the questions and writes:

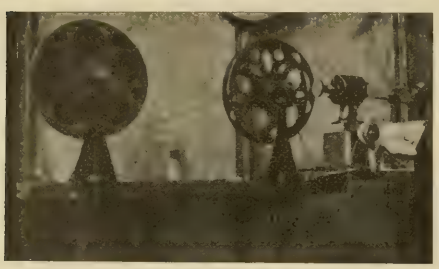
> Have been in the business twelve long years. About eight years ago I considered myself a first class man, but I find that the longer I work the less I know. Especially is this the fact since you started that bunch of questions. I have your Handbook and, believe me, it's the biggest bunch of knowledge tied up in a small package that ever came under my observation. It certainly is great.

Glad to know you appreciate the book, Texas. I see you are a member of the I. A. I wish the organization had more men of your type. It is a wise man who finds out how little he really knows, compared to what he might know, and it is a still wiser man who is willing to admit the fact that he can still learn. I had the name of your town and your own name all nicely attached to this when I saw at the tail end of the letter: "Please don't publish my name." Huh! Why so bashful? The I. A. saw (save the mark!) does not cover communications of this kind, but only those calculated to teach something, or to oppose the I. A. However, most of the locals are wise enough to know that they could not possibly hope to enforce any such foolish legislation, therefore, being wise in their generation, they have kept their fingers out of the fire, and looked the other way when their members refuse to be hobbled by such idiotic legislation.

Motor Drive for Rewind.

Friederich Brothers, proprietors of the Capitol Theater, Pekin, Illinois, contribute the following:

> Enclosed please find small picture illustrating our idea of an inexpensive and at the same time an efficient motor rewind drive. We find it to be very rapid and a great saver of time.



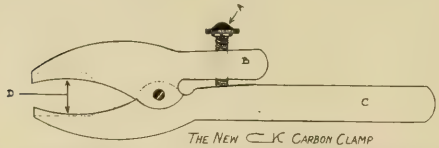
> The smallest kind of a motor will do the work. Simply place the motor on a platform so as to have the shaft level with the center of the reel and have a tension spring hold the rubber wheel against the reel. Secure platform with one screw at the base; turn on the juice, and away she goes. We don't know whether or not it is original, but if it is we hope it will help those who wish to try it.

The photograph is not as clear as it might be. However, as near as I can make it out the contrivance consists of a small motor with a rubber wheel on the end of its shaft. The motor must be on a swinging base, and this rubber wheel held against the side of the outer edge of the side of the reel by a spring, not shown in the photograph. The plan might work well, but how about crooked reels?

Carbon Clamp.

C. J. Kaho, Trinidad, Colorado, says:

> I am having trouble burning my carbons short enough—that is to say, I have been throwing away stubs two or three inches long, because I could not burn them shorter without damage to the clamps, therefore I got busy and invented a contrivance with which I can burn them down to half an inch.



THE NEW KAHO CARBON CLAMP

> The device is 8 inches long. From D to B is 3½ inches. It is made of tool steel. Shaft C is ⅝ of an inch in diameter. The device is placed in the lower carbon jaw of the lamp the same as a carbon, and the carbon stub sets upright in jaw D.

Well, brother Kaho, the device seems to be practical all right, and it will no doubt appeal to many operators and managers. Personally, however, as long as carbons are as cheap as they are, I don't very much believe in bothering with two, or even three-inch stubs. This, however, is not a criticism. I must compliment you on your drawing; it is excellent.

Past the Basket.

Noah Weigant, Carmi, Illinois, orders a set of the questions and says:

> Why not print the department on one side of the page, only, using the other for comments on films or for advertising? It would be much handier to keep on file when cut out. Am using small brads, driven into the hubs of the house reels, instead of clips. They save time and trouble; have used them for the past three years. Have been using a Chambless motor drive attachment in connection with a Kimble variable speed motor during the past two and a half years with perfect results. Last October I made a feed sprocket for my Edison model. It is made of steel and required six hours' time. No film has jumped off it as yet. Will describe it later if you wish. I have also made outside shutters for my Edison Exhibition Model. What would most operators say if they got pins, paper clips and stickers in the reels? I have received films patched with the above merchandise. If any operator wants a good, cheap cement just try banana oil; if for non-inflammable films use acetone. Will come again if this gets past the basket.

All right, brother Weigant, you are past the basket. Come again. As to brads on reel hubs you will have to explain that a little more definitely. I have other good reports of the Chambless motor drive. Concerning the making of sprockets I do not think that I would advise it; feed sprockets are cheap enough, and there are very few who could make as good a sprocket as the ones you buy. I think most operators who run old films find the merchandise you speak of, and most of them find a good deal of it too, much to their disgust. With regard to the printing of the department, other than it is, there are a number of good reasons why it would not be feasible, but which would consume too much space to explain in a satisfactory way.

Where Can He Get It?

Stephen S. Karkula, Jr., Erie, Pennsylvania, is troubled in his mind as follows:

> Received the questions, and now I want information. Please tell me how, and by what method I can gain this knowledge. Can I secure books which will teach these subjects, and if so, where? I am anxious to learn and willing to study hard in order to do so. I have been operating a little more than eleven years, and have both operated and repaired every make of machine except the Pathe. Repairing a projector is just like taking candy away from an infant, but when it comes to generators, transformers, rectifiers, etc., I must admit my knowledge is weak, and I wish to be capable of handling generators and other electerical appliances, and to handle them properly.

Well, brother Karkula, you send me $4.00 and I will have two books mailed to you which, I think, will supply the necessary information. Both of them are thoroughly understandable. It is easy to get books, but hard to get those which can be understood. One of them is a work of a little more than 500 pages, and the other, "The Electric Motor," by Burns, contains about 200 pages. Please understand I am not making one penny on this, and you must enclose 4 cents postage with which to forward the two orders to the publishers. I presume, of course, that you have my own Handbook. If you have not I would advise the purchase of that also. The price is $2.50 from the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. It is a book of 420 pages.

Constable, Help!

M. M. Moon, Gainsville, Texas, says:

> I have had a valuable article stolen, the same being my new Handbook, purchased last summer. The reason I say "valuable," is because it is really needed where moving picture machines are used. I have been an operator several years, but don't think I know enough to do without my Handbook, therefore find enclosed $2.75 for a new book and a copy of the questions. I find things in the department from week to week which help me considerably. In February 28th issue the Minneapolis chap who had a short circuit in his condenser, well—let it pass. He got his. Projection in Gainsville is good, but there is always room for improvement.

Well, friend Moon, I don't see much of anything in your letter that requires comment. My compliments to you as one of those who have not acquired a swelled head, the swelling, as is too often the case, being caused by wind.

Important Notice. Standard Aperture.

Due to the efforts of the Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Company, the Edison Company, the Nicholas Power Company, and the Precision Machine Company have adopted a standard aperture with which all machines are in the future to be equipped. The opening will be 29/32 of an inch in width by three-fourths that height. This is an exceedingly important matter, since it will make the selection of lenses to project a given size picture on a given throw a much easier matter; it will also enable operators to match their picture machine objectives, so that each machine will cover exactly the same amount of space on the screen. The Motiograph aperture is 27/32 x 11/16, which is correct as to width, but a little off as to height.

Easy Mark.

Brooklyn, New York, writes:

> I intend to take a course in moving picture operating in one of those schools which guarantees to procure a position when the course is finished. After working as an operator for four months I intend to purchase a moving picture theater. I am not an electrician. In fact, I do not know anything about electricity. Now would you kindly inform me if it is possible to learn operating in a school; that is to say, learn it so as to be a successful operator without having any electrical qualifications?

My dear sir, everything in this world is possible, except dodging the Grim Reaper, but there are many things which are highly improbable, in fact so highly improbable that they impinge upon the impossible class, and your proposition is one of them. It is really amusing how easy it is to befool people and make monkeys of them. So these schools "guarantee" a job, do they, when the course is completed? Sure! That is easy. I would not go to the length of saying this is the way it is done, but I am perfectly free to say that here is how that particular thing could be worked: The manager of the school makes an arrangement with the manager of some theater, possibly a fairly good house at that, or perhaps a cheap "dump." He may make an arrangement with several managers, and when the "student" finishes his course he is provided with a job in one of these houses, and thus the school manager has legally made good his promise to provide a "position." The "graduate student" works maybe an hour, maybe a day, usually, however, not more than two or three hours, and, being incompetent, is discharged. And what is he going to do about it? The school manager has fulfilled his agreement and the victim would have a hard job proving collusion between the school manager and the theater manager. Yet, without saying it is done every day, I will tip you off to the fact that it could be done every day, and you can make a swift guess as to the rest. No, Brooklyn, there is just one way to learn to be an operator—that is a real operator, namely: to serve an apprenticeship. You take the same amount of money you are going to pay that school, and pay it to some really good operator, and you will get much better results. What you do learn will at least be practical, and the real thing as far as it goes. How much you will learn will depend upon the amount of time and energy you devote to it.

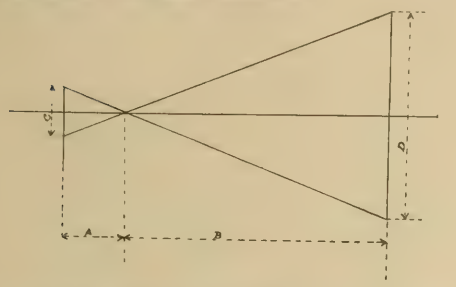
A Correction.

In quoting prices on its cement recently, the Edison Mfg. Company made an error. The gallon price should have been $7.00 instead of $9.00. However, the bottle price remains the same, and the gallon price won't be of much interest to the operator.

From Ansonia.

John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut, writes:

I desire to congratulate brother Armstrong on his deductions, as set forth in March 14th issue of the department, and his excellent drawing and description of same. It is certainly to brother Armstrong's credit that he sought and found the why and wherefore, and arrived at so sound a conclusion. The fundamental basis for the rule in question is that the length of a line drawn parallel to the base of an isosceles triangle varies directly as the distance of the line from the apex of the triangle. Thus, a line 1½ inches in length 2 inches from the apex would become 3 inches long if drawn at a distance of 4 inches from the apex. As the width of the aperture is represented by a line drawn at a distance equal to the equivalent focus of a lens from the apex of the triangle, it is obvious that a line drawn at twice that distance would be twice as long as the width of the aperture. (Votes for women! Oh my, such a headache!—Ed.). Thus we see that friend Armstrong's reasoning is proven correct, inasmuch as by lengthening the throw by a distance equal to the e. f. of the lens the width of the angle has increased by the width of the aperture. (All of which is respectfully referred to Mr. Miller, Chicago.—Ed.).



By method of simple proportion we get. A is to B as C is to D. A=equivalent focus. B=length of throw. C=width of aperture. D=width of picture.

A:B::C:D

Example to find width of P. 5:70::15/16:X 70×15/16=65.625. 65.625=5X : X=5÷65.625=13.125=width of picture.

Example to find length of throw. 5:X::15/16:13.125. 13.125×5=65.625. 65.625÷15/16=70=length of throw.

Example to find equivalent focus. X:70::15/16:13.125. 70×15/16=65.625. 65.625÷13.125=5=equivalent focus.

Example to find width of aperture. 13.125::X:5:70. 13.125×5=65.625. 65.625÷70=.9375=15/16.

My reason for submitting the sketch is that I believe operators will get a better understanding of the rule by seeing it illustrated. Some are puzzled by the rule, because some of the factors are in inches and some in feet. It will be seen from the sketch that we are dealing with two triangles and the inch factors belong to the small triangle, whereas the feet belong to the large one. It is just a matter of convenience, and so long as we do not alter the proportion between the length of the base and the length of the altitude of either triangle the results will be correct. I think it is the best plan to measure the width of the aperture with a vernier calliper rule in hundredths of an inch; though, of course, the e. f. would also have to be in hundredths. Thus the proportions with a 5/16 aperture and a 4 inch e. f. lens would be 9345:40000. Everything is O. K. using the 1/16 unit if the aperture is just 15/16, but if it happens to be a little under or a little over there will be an error in the calculations. Once the rule given in the Handbook is thoroughly understood it becomes only a simple problem in proportion in which three factors are known from which to find the fourth.

All of which, I think, requires no comment. I have other excellent articles on the action of light rays from brother Griffiths, but have withheld all matter of this kind from publication because I have tried to shorten things up all I could to get space for the long article on light rays by brother James, which appeared in last week's issue.

Martin Rotary Converter.

George Thompkins, St. Louis, Missouri, writes:

Can you give me any definite information concerning the Martin Rotary Converter, manufactured by the North Western Electric Company, Chicago, Ill.? What is its efficiency, and is it well constructed?

No, I cannot give you any information concerning this device. I have received descriptive advertising literature from the North Western Electric Company, from which I see that these converters are designed to operate on 110, 220 and 440 volt a. c. supply; 25, 30 and 60 cycle, delivering d. c. at from 60 to 80 volts. The aforesaid literature does not give any data as to the efficiency of the device, nor has the North Western Electric Company, up to date, taken any steps to convince this department that its converter is a well made and an electrically efficient piece of machinery, and until they do this I cannot recommend the device to operators or managers. In fact, I am firmly convinced that it would have a very salutary effect if theater managers would refrain from purchasing apparatus of this kind until its efficiency has been demonstrated to this department. That is one of the things that the Projection Department is for, and it goes without saying that if manufacturers were obliged to demonstrate the efficiency of their apparatus before it could be sold, they would spare no pains to make their machinery as efficient as it could possibly be made. As it is, manufacturers can make any claim they see fit, and the average exhibitor is in no position to dispute it. But manufacturers cannot make that kind of claim to this department and get away with it, unless they back it up with practical demonstrations and tests. Please understand me clearly. I am only making this recommendation to managers for their own protection. It is nothing to this department, one way or the other, if managers buy apparatus which is not efficient, and which causes them continual loss by reason of the fact that it is not as electrically efficient as it could and should be.

More Good Work.

The editor recently dropped in at — ——— ——— ——— to look things over. He was most agreeably surprised. The front is neat and very pretty, but the inside of the theater presented as pleasing an appearance, everything considered, as anything he has ever seen. The ceiling is paneled with heavy metal covered beams, and the walls are decorated in panel effect, the color scheme being in three shades of gray, but, due to the lighting, the appearance is of a very soft dove color. The indirect lighting system consists of fixtures having a ruby-red translucent bottom. The side lights are not lights at all in the accepted sense of the term, but merely incandescent globes behind oval-shaped coverings of ruby-red cut glass. The operating room is of ample proportions, and well ventilated. The equipment consists of two Standard projectors. Harry Kreisman is in charge of projection, and the results on the screen were very good indeed, considering the fact that he was using alternating current through a transformer. Brother Kreisman not only gets a fairly brilliant screen illumination on a somewhat large picture, but maintains a clear field without shadows. His speed was well judged throughout, and he is to be congratulated on his work. Maurice L. Fleischman, who is manager of this house, is a most pleasant gentleman, and, judging by the results, an able manager.

From New Orleans.

New Orleans, Louisiana, orders one of Mr. Swoope's works, and says:

It appears to me that operators in this city are not, taken as a whole, of the progressive kind. They seem to be content to let things drift along, instead of trying to improve matters. For instance: I doubt if there are ten operators in this city who have copies of your Handbook. And yet while they adopt the "I should worry" attitude they wonder why they are paid such small salaries. Also, for the benefit of them and the craft and everything in general, all competent operators should belong to the I. A. T. S. E., but it seems as if a considerable number of the New Orleans men regard the organization as a joke. This type of man is sleeping, but I hope some day he will awaken to a full realization of the fact that the man who is content to drift with the tide will never cut any considerable figure as a moving picture operator or as anything else.

All of which is absolutely and entirely true. If any considerable number of New Orleans operators are content to drift along, without any effort to improve their work or their condition, then New Orleans is indeed in a bad state, and the moving picture industry of that city will not come into its own until either these operators wake up or are displaced by more energetic and enterprising men.

A Tension Device.

Carl Green, Logansport, Indiana, is the patentee of a film tension device designed to take the place of tension shoes or springs bearing directly on the film at the aperture plate. The patent number is 1,057,234. He asks me to comment on the same.

As nearly as I can understand the thing the top sprocket and the intermittent sprocket are both driven intermittently by a train of gears, the top sprocket being held in such manner that it will create tension on the film by means of a clock spring arrangement. The film passes from the top sprocket down across the aperture over two rollers and thence to the intermittent. The plan is, if I understand it right, impractical, by reason of the momentum of the three large gears and the added momentum of the top sprocket and two rollers. If I misunderstand the matter, friend Green has his patent drawings to blame.

Has Moved.

The Eclair Film Company, which is making a home projector, "Kineclair," which was reviewed recently by the editor of this department, has removed to 126 West 46th Street, New York City, where the machine is now on exhibition. It has, I understand, been considerably improved.

From Alaska.

M. E. Palmer, Wrangell, Alaska, orders a Handbook and says:

Can't seem to keep the lower loop of my Power's Six. The machine will be running along all right, when all at once the loop will slip right off just as though the sprocket were speeded up ahead of the machine. The films we get up here are pretty badly worn sometimes. Would that cause the trouble?

I think, brother Palmer, your trouble is most likely due to the fact that you have your take-up tension set too tight. Turn to page 226 of the Handbook, where you will find the Power's take-up illustrated. Loosen thumb screw 14 and slack off on spring 12 slightly by letting the washer slip out on the shaft a little. Adjust this spring so that take-up will just barely revolve the reel at the end of the run. Also see to it that your lower sprocket idler is properly adjusted. See instruction No. 12, page 217. Also read general instruction No. 13 carefully.

The Book Is Fine.

J. Griem, Appleton, Wis., asks for the address of the book on motors, and says that the Swoope work is fine, and that every operator ought to have one. All of which is perfectly correct.

Another Rudyard Kipling.

Edward J. Wise, Auburn, New York, relieves his system of the following load:

People come and people go
To see a moving picture show;
And while they sit, and gaze and dream,
They never think of him who throws
The picture on the screen.

He sits all day and grinds and grinds.
Until his eyes are almost blind.
And when at night he falls asleep,
He's framing pictures on the sheet.

You have made a tremendous mistake, brother Wise, in the last two lines of the first stanza. A great many among the audience think, and think deeply, of the man who hurls the picture at the screen, and in many theaters if there were a pile of bricks handy he would probably have evidence of that fact. In the second line of the second stanza you have explained what has always been to me a mystery. I have often been at a loss to account for the results I have seen on some screens, but now it is all as plain as day—the poor gink was blind. Let us hope, however, that the last two lines of the second stanza are correct, and that when he tries to sleep he is not only "framing pictures on the sheet," but he is studying how to frame them right, because there are quite a number of him who needs to study in his sleep, since he won't study when he is awake.

Another From the Rio Grande.

Leo Willis, Eagle Pass, Texas, writes:

The condenser focus measurer of mine has been beaten by that of John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut. You certainly gave Minneapolis hot shot about the cheap sneer he tried to spring. It was good. In February 28th issue, C. W. McClure, of Phoenix, Arizona, says, with regard to different scenes being out of focus: "If the camera lens was racked back too far, or ahead too far, the motion picture lens would give the best results in the same relative position." I take it he means by this that you should readjust the motion picture lens. With this I disagree, because if the camera was out of focus you could not help matters a bit by readjusting the projection lens. You can only make things sharp on the screen that are sharp in the film. I trust brother McClure will not take offense at this criticism. On page 1234, March 7th issue, G. H. Stephens makes a statement and shows by diagram, Figure 2, that the rays project in parallel lines from the back combination of the objective. Will you please ask the brother why, if this be the case, do the rays continue thus to the screen if the front combination of the objective be removed? Page 1381, March 14th issue, "A Fine Piece of Work," is very clear, and I am sure not many of us ever thought of drawing it out like that, although some of us understand the why and wherefore of the rules. However, the thing is explained very clearly and the brother deserves all the credit you have extended him. I believe, however, his rules, though very correct and good, could be made somewhat plainer. Here is my own solution, though possibly I should have said easier to remember instead of plainer. Let D equal the distance; S the size of screen image; A size of aperture; E equivalent focus. We then have D-A. Expre-sed this way you just put your thumb on the factor you want to know and what remains will give you the answer. I can truthfully say that this stunt is original with myself, or at least I do not know anyone else who ever worked it out that way. The only advantage I claim is that it is easier to remember. This is the rule of thumb. To apply it suppose you wish to find the distance. Cover up D, and S-E multiplied by A gives it.

With regard to your rule of thumb, brother, it is all right, only it won't work. It is correct to find the equivalent focus, but in the example you have given when you cover up D you would have A divided by (S, multiplied by E). In fractions the number on the upper side of the line is always divided by the number under the line. If this formula could be arranged so that it would work in all cases it would indeed be a very convenient thing. I have not time now to dope that proposition out, and I would suggest that friend Armstrong might see if he cannot fix this up for us. As to brother Stephens' statement, he is theoretically correct. The rear condenser is supposed to deliver the rays in parallel lines, and under proper conditions it does so, as near as such an imperfect lens is able to do. As a matter of fact, however, I think by reason of wrong lens combinations the rear condenser seldom actually does deliver the rays in parallel lines. I believe we will all be helped out in this matter, to a large extent, by brother James' article last week.

Picture Dazzles.

Frank W. MacDonald, Detroit, Michigan, writes:

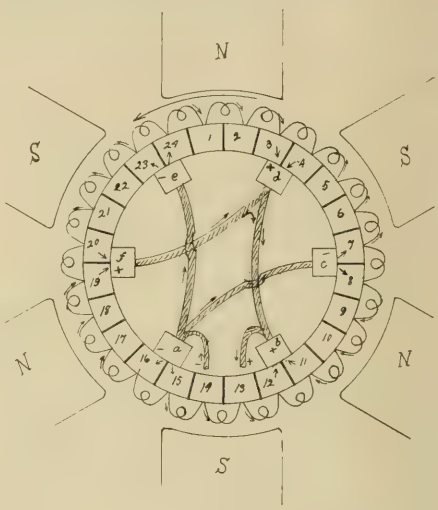
Have been experiencing some difficulty with my picture. The house manager says there is a dazzle to it ,and that the black upon the picture, particularly upon printed matter, does not show up as black as it should, or as black in some places as in others. He admits there is nothing wrong with the brilliancy or steadiness of the picture, only that it has an annoying haze, yet he lays the trouble to the machine. We have at present a so-called sunlight curtain. About a month ago we had a flat paint screen, the formula for which I got from your Handbook, and he pronounced it very good. My objective lens is also in quite bad condition, there being a number of scratches and flaws in it. The machine is a 1912 Motiograph; 4½ lens, and we use 40 amperes at the arc.

The trouble lies, I think, in the fact that you have a semi-reflective screen, the surface of which is too smooth; also it probably has to a considerable extent a polished surface. Such a screen, while it gives a very bright picture for a given amperage, always, or practically always, presents the annoying haze of which you complain. The remedy is a screen with an unpolished, slightly roughened or matte surface.

Dynamo Action.

G. Gunnarson, Brooklyn, New York, writes:

With regard to Stillwater's letter, March 14th issue, you say that the thing looks reasonable. Now I don't know whether I understand the drawing right or not, but I think brother Stillwater has in mind a parallel or multicircuit winding dynamo. Attached drawing illustrates such a generator, only the commutator being shown, with the coils indicated by the loops, and the brushes shown bearing on the inside of the segments. Not because they actually do so, but in order to avoid confusing the diagram. Each segment is connected to the end of one coil and the beginning of the next. Now there are but two ends to each coil, therefore we have one end of each of two coils connected to each segment so that it naturally follows that there are as many segments as coils. This is true of all closed coil windings of whatever kind. Suppose that, in the diagram, brush B receives 100 amperes; 50 amperes will enter from segment 11, and 50 from segment 12.



As the armature revolves, coils 11-12 will move to the right and the current will flow in the direction 11-12. An instant before the position in the figure was reached, the coil was to the left and the current in it was flowing in the direction 12-11. In the winding also the current enters by the brushes A, C, and E, dividing each brush, as shown by the arrows, and traveling by six paths from negative to positive brushes. If any one brush were omitted two of the paths would have no current, and those remaining would have more than their share, which would cause undesirable unbalancing. Multicircuit windings are therefore always provided with as many brushes as there are poles. This type of winding has many paths and is used for small, low-potential machines, which have a comparatively large amperage output, as well as for large dynamos of a great current output. I am operating a Power's Six and find that most any trouble can be overcome with the help of the Projection Department and your Handbook.

This is going a little farther into technical discussion than I had intended. I publish brother Gunnarson's letter because he went to the trouble of making a most excellent drawing, and one which required a lot of time. I want the operator to get, through the department or elsewhere, a good general knowledge of the action of generators, but I am inclined to doubt the advisability of going into matters this far in the department, though the operator can, through the medium of books on electricity, go as far as he likes. Perhaps, however, my own error was in allowing friend Stillwater to go into the matter as deeply as he did. Now, brother Gunnarson, don't take this as a call down; it is not by any manner of means, but simply an explanation. As I understand you, all brushes of the same polarity in multi-polar machines are connected directly together, which is, of course, necessarily correct, since otherwise the current from all the brushes could not reach the line. I think a careful study of your sketch will help operators considerably in understanding generator connections. With this like other things it is quite simple once you grasp the fundamental idea, but until you do this it is anything else but simple.

A Humidor Can.

The National Waterproof Film Company, of Chicago, Ill., is putting out what it calls a humidor film can. I have not seen one of these cans, but from the illustration in the literature I should say that it was an ordinary metal film box or can, round in shape, in the bottom of which is affixed some thin absorbent material under a wire gauze. They claim that the can will soften old, brittle film or keep new film in good condition, and that the chemical preparation with which the absorbent is moistened will last three or four months, whereupon it can be renewed by pouring in one or two ounces of fresh chemical. The chemical costs $1.00 per quart, or $2.50 per gallon. The cans cost $1.00 each. I would not like to comment one way or the other on the practicability of this device without an extended test.

Collodion Cement.

J. H. Hanson, Lubec, Maine, writes:

Received the questions all right, for which I thank you. Let us know when the rest are ready. If an operator should run short of cement, collodion, which can be had at any drug store, is excellent for both kinds of film, while new-skin can be used on inflammable stock, though I don't know about the N. I. New-skin, however, is very expensive for this purpose. Why does the Biograph make a patch at practically every scene? Drawing 43, page 102, of the Handbook, is wrong regarding transformer, as you undoubtedly are aware. I suppose it slipped by through some error.

I don't catch your idea with regard to Figure 43. If the installation consists of a rheostat at 1 and an economizer at 2, with a switch at X and 3, then when switch 3 is open and switch X is closed, the rheostat is in use and the transformer is not, although its secondary is charged. When switch X is opened and switch 3 is closed, the opposite prevails. It is not an ideal installation by any manner of means, but it would work all right. As to the questions: I don't know whether I will send out the second half or not. Absurd as it may seem to you, it is a matter of fact that I lost a considerable amount of money on the first bunch. It costs almost $60.00 to have those booklets printed, to say nothing of the bother and time of getting them ready. I lose all that time, and probably $25.00 besides, since only the really enterprising men cared to secure the questions in advance, and their number is limited. I'll consider it, but I don't think I can see my way clear to lose both the time and the money. As to the Biograph patches: you can search me as to why they follow such antiquated methods.

He Likes the Books.

Virginia writes:

I must admit that I was in the punk class until I purchased a copy of your Handbook. This book made many things clear to me, and, although I don't know it all yet, still my work now ranks with the best we have here, and on the whole projection in our city is fairly good. I am going to order a copy of the Handbook for a friend soon, and also "The Technique of the Photoplay" for myself. Some of our boys are going to be in New York this summer and intend to call upon you. And now for some questions. Should the intermittent oil casing of the Power's Six A have a small hole near the center, out of which the oil continually oozes? Could you give me Mr. Edison's personal address—an address where a letter will reach him?

You are not the only one, brother, who has improved his work very materially through a study of the Handbook. That book contains almost 420 pages of matter, every word of which is of value to the operator of manager. As to the hole in the oil casing: No; if there is a hole near its center, plug it up. A letter marked personal and addressed to Mr. Thomas A. Edison, Orange, N. J., will reach him, or rather will reach his secretary, who will present it to Mr. Edison if it seems to be of sufficient importance to justify the consumption of Mr. Edison's valuable time in considering it.

From Cleveland.

Cleveland, Ohio, contributes the following:

I would like to say a few words to the boys in connection with their work and affiliation with the I. A. Moving picture operators' affiliation with the I. A. places them on a concrete foundation in the amusement business, and being in a business directly dependent upon public favor, they feel secure in the organization's protection. Many of the brothers maintain a high standard in their work, and are therefore respected by their employers, but I am sorry to say the majority have acquired a false feeling of security, and not a few opportunities are overlooked through the blinding effect of the haze of their protection. We are living in a broad and intelligent age, where the man with high ideals is forging ahead, and the man with views antagonistic to progress deteriorates. The latter is the condition of mind of many operators with relation to their employers. I have heard several operators say: "Requisitions for supplies and pay night furnishes speaking acquaintance with the boss; outside of that we are content to let him go his way and we ours." If that is the predominant feeling among operators I very much fear for the future, both as applied to projection and to the business as a whole. I know from experience that the majority of operators do not reach out for responsibilities; in fact, they evade responsibility, and then dismally announce that there is "no future for them in the picture game." These fellows patch film by saying, "Let the next guy do it." They leave misframes for the film inspector to remove; they tear off leaders without replacing them; they speed up the rewind and thus injure more films in a day than their projector does in a month. They neglect their machines and operating rooms; they waste carbons, and are shiftless in their habits in and around the show. They also have other objectionable habits which tend to make a grouchy boss, and loosen the foundation which their organization rests upon. This class of operators will never have a future in the picture game, or for that matter in any other game. They cannot see beyond the confines of their own little, narrow, contracted, piffling horizon, and some will never realize, or recognize, the opportune value of the confines of their own operating rooms. The operators—and there are many of them—who are thorough in their work, who make a close study of methods, and of their profession, who grit their teeth when a new manager falls asleep on the buzzer and attend strictly to business, remembering the fact that that new manager will probably either improve or else get out, finally attain such heights as electrical engineers, machine experts, and advertising managers of large amusement companies. Such operators will acquire a place in the world. With a feeling they are working in a business dependent on the favor of the public, they will take advantage of the opportunities the I. A. secures for them, instead of throwing themselves bodily on the organization as a dead weight. They will not remain in a semi-comatose state depending entirely upon the organization to bolster up an untenable position. The I. A. tries to do everything possible to further the interests of the operator, but, you, in turn, as a member of the I. A. must remember that you should work for the interest of your employer, keeping within your time limit, of course, and demanding I. A. working conditions. But the operator who is narrow in relation to his employer, who stands pat in every case, who refuses to compromise, regardless of whether he is wholly right or entirely wrong, and takes advantage of every opportunity to neglect details, is living in a house of glass builded upon a foundation of sand. He is not a credit to the I. A. and ought not to be upheld by the organization. And now let me close with the following hints to the operator who is just barely earning his pay: If the boss is a grouch and a tightwad, be careful to do everything in your power to make his picture the best possible under the conditions. Confine your opinions and suggestions to matters pertaining to projection, and leave the other things alone. If your efforts produce no results on pay night the knowledge gained will make you a better operator, and the really good man cannot be kept down.

To comment at length on this letter would merely be to reiterate opinions already ofttimes expressed. The Cleveland brother talks good, hard, sound sense, and he is absolutely correct in every way. I would commend his letter to the careful perusal not only of his Cleveland brothers, but to members of the I. A. all over the country. The officials of Chicago Local No. 2 might read it with large profit, as could also possibly a large number of their membership.

A Change of Base.

The New York City Board of Moving Picture Operators' Examiners, of which Mr. George R. Brown is chief examiner, has moved into the new Municipal Building, where it is now located on the 21st floor and ready for business.

The new quarters consist of a spacious waiting room, an office of ample proportion, and the examination room, or, as one New York operator remarked, two rooms and the chamber of horrors. The new quarters are very nice indeed, and a big improvement over the old rented offices in the Park Row Building.

The editor has, during the past four years, received hundreds of complaints from operators in which charges of unfair examination have been made. I want to say again that I do not think there is anything in these charges. In the first place there is no reason why the board should be unfair, and in the second place I do not believe Mr. Brown would stand for anything of that kind. The only criticism I have to offer is that there ought to be one practical operator connected therewith. The editor of this department has been accorded the courtesy of attending and listening to the examinations at any time he may desire, and, as soon as time will permit, he intends to take advantage of that permission. I think that the charges of unfairness arise through the fact that operators, particularly if they are not sure of their own ability, become excited and nervous, and misunderstand or misinterpret questions asked. Ofttimes the examiner bases his conclusion as much or more on the manner of the applicant and the way he tackles things as on the actual answer made. The man who shows self-confidence and goes about things in a business like way is not nearly as likely to be turned down as the man who shows by his manner that he is in doubt as to his own ability.

Condenser Mount.

John D. Elbert, San Francisco, California, whose advertisement appeared on page 448 last week, has sent the department samples of a condenser mount which it seems to me are very excellent indeed. The mount is made to fit any casing. That for the Power's Six consists of a piece of brass ½ inch thick, in two sections, between which the edge of the lens is clamped. The idea is that this thick brass will retain the heat and prevent the edge of the condenser cooling down faster than its thick center.

Mr. Elbert says that a condenser in this mount can be taken out and laid down on a cold marble slab without breaking, and I have no doubt but that he states the truth. The thing looks good to me, and I believe its adoption will to all intents and purposes stop condenser breakage. I saw the same device in brother Woods' operating room when I was in San Francisco last summer, and I stated the same thing about it at that time, but now it is on the market. It has my most hearty recommendation.

Patenting a Device.

H. M. Jolly, Columbia, South Carolina, sends photograph of a motor drive attachment he has invented for the Edison machine and wants to know if I think it would be worth patenting. No, brother Jolly, I don't. It is a very clever arrangement all right, but there are already at least a half dozen excellent motor drive devices on the market, so I am quit sure you would be simply wasting money to procure a patent. Sorry, old man, to have to give you that kind of advice, but facts are facts. None of the patentees of motor drives have made fortunes, so far as I know.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

Comments on the Films

ALL IN THE AIR (Lubin), April 7.—This is one of those rapid-fire, nonsensical pictures that appears to be the vogue—or "back to the old farce days"—just after the war. It is fathered by E. W. Sargent (don't say that I said so) and causes general laughter throughout the entire unreeling. The old circus days will be recalled to baldheads and gray tops while reviewing this picture. It is finely pushed over by Raymond McKee, Levine Herman and Harry Rice. Exhibitors can book this offering with the confidence that it will please. Almost forgot to say Arthur Hotaling deserves mention for direction.

THE BULLY'S DOOM (Lubin), April 7.—On the same reel with "All in the Air" is another offering directed by Arthur Hotaling and written by Frank E. Griffin, introducing some tough residents in a tough neighborhood. There is little that can be construed into comedy in this picture. The characters are well portrayed by Francis Ne Moyer, Frank Griffin and Jerold Hevener; that is about all that redeems it.

THE PRICE OF HIS HONOR (Essanay), April 7.—This photoplay is along the lines of numerous others which have preceded it; a weak man and a true and self-sacrificing woman. There is nothing convincing in it nor is there a moral taught. Anguish seems to be the main theme, and in this respect it fulfills its mission. The leading part is portrayed by Richard C. Travers in an able manner. Ruth Stonehouse is his sweetheart, who sacrifices her own happiness and lives in a state of anguish for his sake. Lillian Drew is the typist, and Helen Dunbar is the mother; both do good work. This number will please.

THE BLACK MASK (Edison), April 7.—This is the first story of the series to be captioned "The Man Who Disappeared." It is well produced and has a gripping interest in the plot. Marc MacDermott plays the leading part in an artistic and dignified manner. It is a singular sort of a character, combining weakness with strength. He is addicted to the drink habit, but his inate pride sustains him to a great extent. He sacrifices his own interests for his sweetheart's brother, who involves himself in debt, and shoulders a worse crime to save the girl from sorrow. Miriam Nesbitt is the sister and Barry O'Moore the weak brother. It is a good offering.

WHIFFLE'S NIGHT OUT (Pathe), April 7.—Did he get his night out? Through duplicity he manages to get away from home for the purpose of enjoying himself with boon companions, by pretending to go to the bedside of a seriously ill aunt. His wife finds the telegram from the "bunch," which he accidently leaves behind, and it enlightens her and she slips a little note into a magazine she gives him to while the hours away. He finds it and how he whiles those hours away is very entertaining. This is a worthy comedy, and finely produced.

ANCIENT RUINS AT THEBES, EGYPT (Pathe), April 7.—A historical picture of travel that is of value, as it affords a peek into a remote corner of the old world that ninety-nine per cent. of the occupants of mother earth would not see otherwise. This is on the same reel with "Whiffle's Night Out." It is very educational.

A MIX-UP ON THE PLAINS (Selig), April 7.—A Western pictureplay with a strong comedy element. It involves, in its development, a series of incidents in separate paths that blend together in a surprising and laughable way in the finale. The director deserves credit for good work in this offering, and the acting and camera work are up to the standard.

THE TERMITE, THE INSECT ARCHITECT (Pathe), April 8.—On the same reel with "The Grafters." The Termites in form and habit closely resemble the ant, but their architectural feats are far superior to those of the ant, for the Termite builds a hill fifteen to twenty feet high. Every phase of their life and every incident connected with these curious insects is accurately portrayed in the film.

THE GRAFTERS (Pathe), April 8.—This is a laughable animated cartoon by J. R. Bray. It is on the same reel with "The Termite, the Insect Architect," and is very laughable and interesting, especially to the little folk.

ANDY AND THE HYPNOTIST (Edison), April 8.—This is fifth of the Andy series and is about on a par with the others. Andy becomes a hypnotic subject. He is transformed into an Indian, and not being "snapped" out of the influence, proceeds to demonstrate the Indian proclivities. He scalps a wooden Indian cigar sign that belongs to a different tribe, as he imagines, and goes on the warpath, capturing paleface squaws galore. His mother eventually convinces him, in a vigorous manner, that he is out of his element.

THE RUBE (Selig), April 8.—This photoplay was written by Harry R. O'Brien and produced by Marshall Farnum. It is crammed full of characters and exploits. Bunny Summers (Clifford Bruce), a country boy, who prior to going to college has grown into manhood, practically, and never has ridden on a railroad train—before or behind—think of it. The picture is well done photographically, but the development of the plot is too absurd for further mention. The picture will probably please those who are fond of football.

THE BARGAIN HUNTERS (Essanay), April 8.—A very enjoyable and serious comedy, depicting the housekeeping experiences of a young married couple that bring back memories that haunt. The young wife determines to economize and attends bargain sales, where she purchases all sorts of household necessities at half price. The future results are very funny.

'FRAID CAT (Vitagraph), April 8.—An exceptional and pleasing offering, featuring a superior and natural little actor that many would be pleased to grab out of the picture and hug-up. His name is Bobby Connelly, and to say he is cute, does not do the little gentleman justice; he is finished. Tefft Johnson as daddy Jim, Doroth Kelly as mother dear and Albert Roccardi ably helped Sonny Jim along. This is an enjoyable picture.

THE LITTLE SHERIFF (Vitagraph), April 9.—This shows Buddy Harris as the sheriff's son. He takes down the forbidden gun and rounds up a bad man, with the aid of his dog. The story brings much laughter and applause, although it is poorly constructed in places. Buddy himself is very pleasing in this number. An unusually good child story.

FINE FEATHERS MAKE FINE BIRDS (Melies), April 9.—A comedy, done in an entertaining manner. The wife, in order to disillusionize her husband, hides the wig and other apparel of the songstress and raises an alarm, exposing her to ridicule. Not entirely new, but quite amusing.

BATTY BILL WINS A BABY (Melies), April 9.—This, on same reel with above, shows the efforts made by Batty Bill to get rid of an unwelcome baby. Trick photography and plenty of action help out the offering, which proves very enjoyable.

WHEN A WOMAN GUIDES (Biograph), April 9.—A typical political story, in which the mayor is induced by a girl political worker to inspect the tenements. He finally agrees to this and as a result forces passage of the cleanup bill. This is well acted and nicely pictured. The tenement scenes could have been more representative of conditions existing. The film has an excellent purpose behind it and is quite forcefully presented.

SNAKEVILLE'S NEW SHERIFF (Essanay), April 9.—Another of this amusing series of Western comedies. Slippery Slim, being at outs with his wife, is made sheriff against his will. He succeeds in capturing Reno Bill after a series of entertaining incidents. The photography is good and the film generally pleasing.

THE FIRE JUGGLERS (Selig), April 9.—This picture has an unusual plot and one that is not without a good motive. It illustrates the troubles sometimes encountered by women who allow themselves to become enamored of celebrities. Mrs. Leavitt's experiences with the artist proved a needed lesson and she was glad to return to her husband. This is well photographed and handled in a pleasing manner.

AN EASTER LILY (Vitagraph), April 10.—This is an amusing picture in black and white. Little Bobby Connelly (Sonny Jim), whose natural and artistic acting is wonderful, rigs up Lily, the colored washlady's little daughter, with an Easter outfit and escorts her to church and into the family pew with a dignity worthy of his General-uncle, as Sonny denominates him. This picture is a real comedy, and Elaine Sterne, the author, is to be complimented for evolving the story. Tefft Johnson, in the direction, has done full justice to the details. Ada Utley as Lily is the acme of naturalness. The cast, without exception, is eminently satisfactory. This picture will please any audience.

RED HEAD INTRODUCES HERSELF (Selig), April 10.—This is heralded as a comedy and supposedly the first of a series to be introduced. If the display of nether limbs on the part of the "Red Head" can be construed into comedy then the picture is funny. The idea conceived by Mr. W. E. Wing, the author, is fair to middling, but Norval McGregor has made the mistake of placing the title role. Not that Harriet Notter is not clever in the part, but she is too elongated and mature, and it is an injustice not only to her, but to the picture. Many absurd scenes are introduced also. On the same reel with "All Mixed Up"; rather coincidental.

ON THE BRINK (Lubin), April 10.—The moral flavor of this story is questionable. It exploits the vacillating and weak nature of a woman that carries to the spectator, as the picture develops on the screen, a feeling of disgust. There is in the finale a rather redeeming episode, chanced by the husband, to bring his wife to a realization of her folly. A well made and reasonably acted picture.

HUBBY'S NIGHT OFF (Kalem), April 10.—This photoplay is on the same reel with "Gertie Gets the Cash" and concerns a newly wed couple in their first deception toward each other. How it works out in the finale to mutual confessions is interesting and amusing. John E. Brennan and Ruth Roland are the husband and wife and play the parts very naturally. The burglar deserves mention—he is a knockout.

GERTIE GETS THE CASH (Kalem), April 10.—An impossible plot, that is laughable nevertheless, rendered by Laura Oakley and Ruth Roland in the leading roles. Matilda Grimkins, an old maid (Laura Oakley), offers her niece $10,000 on the day she is married. The niece (Ruth Roland) determines to get the money without encumbering herself with a husband. How she accomplishes this is weird and wonderful.

HICKSVILLE'S FINEST (Biograph), April 11.—Each cop was tested. When Inspector Beans called for a photograph of the force at headquarters, it was up to them to look powerful. Good makeups are invented, the inspector is impressed and investigates. There is a hurry call, and the force comes to grief.

RINGS AND ROBBERS (Biograph), April 11.—This offering is on the same reel with "Hickville's Finest" and on the same par; one is about as amusing as the other. Some of the characters are almost human.

UNDER DESPERATION'S SPUR (Kalem), April 11.—A picture story the plot of which is laid among the moonshiners in the Blue Ridge Mountains. It is very interesting and for this style of picture is well produced and acted. Helen Holmes is the mountain girl, who is accidentally blinded while filling cartridges. There is a love story that ends satisfactorily.

AT HIS EXPENSE (Lubin), April 11.—A clean and interesting picture that tells of a man's weakness for strong drink, but through friends' aid and his own endeavors finally makes good. A robbery is frustrated by his interference and bravery. Altogether this is an interesting picture, although there are some details lacking.

THE TREACHERY OF BRONCHO BILLY'S PAL (Essanay), April 11.—Broncho Billy and his pal are in love with Peggy Adams. Each receive a letter that the one who reaches her first shall win her. They cut the cards to see who will go, and Broncho Billy wins. On the way he is shot by a half-breed who has a grudge against him. Broncho Billy immediately comes to the conclusion that his pal shot him, and at first is tempted to seek revenge, but decides otherwise. He sacrifices his love for his pal's sake and wends his way to other parts, leaving the field clear. A very good offering.

THE CHINESE FAN (Edison), April 11.—This is number five of the "Dolly of the Dailies" series, written by Acton Davies. Dolly gets a scoop for her paper and rescues a missing girl from a Chinese joint on Mott Street. It is all very exciting and rapid-fire. Mary Fuller shows herself to be some scrapper in an emergency.

THE BATTLE OF THE WEAK (Vitagraph), April 13.—This picture-play in some respects is a superior one and in others it is weak and incongruous. The director in one scene is imbued with a great conception, having a team and double sleigh run "splack" over the unconscious heroine (the horses passing on either side of her) and the vehicle is stopped in a position to cover her. Three or four men are required, seemingly, to pull her from under the sleigh. The team could have been driven up a couple of picas, easily, and cleared her form, obviating the dragging act and made it easier for the girl. Such "overlookings" are not overlooked by spectators. It is interesting nevertheless.

THE BONDAGE OF FEAR (Biograph), April 13.—Not a very pleasant picture to view, as it shows the ingratitude of a worthless son toward a crippled father, and a loving and faithful sister. He has served a term in prison for counterfeiting and assumes his old tactics immediately on his release and attempts to force his sister to incriminate herself by getting rid of the spurious money. The offending part of the picture is the brutality of the son, it is exaggerated beyond reason, and in truth, such characters tend to lower pictures in public estimation. The photography is well done. Irene Howley deserves mention for her good work, also Glen White, William Russell, Julia Hurley and the gentleman who essayed the crippled father.

QUARANTINED (Edison), April 13.—There is a decided novelty to this photoplay. The cast is entirely made up of juveniles headed by Edna May Hammel. If played by adults the picture in itself would be bad, but as done by the children it is very amusing. Considerable film is wasted to lengthen it, but all credit is due the little folks.

THE THREE GEESE (Melies), April 13.—This is quite an amusing comedy concerning the making of moving pictures. A general mixup of the characters caused by misunderstandings, especially on the part of a verdant old pair, father and mother of the star actor. It is a well acted and lively picture. Find the three geese.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 30 (Pathe), April 13.—A very interesting series this. It shows some wonderful scenes of the disastrous fire in St. Augustine, Florida, taken by the camera after two o'clock, in the morning, also a panoramic view by daylight of the devastation. Many other topical scenes at home and abroad are shown.

Licensed Specials

MEMORIES THAT HAUNT (Vitagraph), April 7.—This two-reel picture offering is one of great merit and carries with it a strong plot that is entertaining and convincing. Its author is James Oliver Curwood and Captain Harry Lambert is the director. One of the strongest scenes is the shipwreck, when innumerable passengers leap from the decks of the doomed vessel into the sea. The hero is shown floating on a piece of wreckage which is washed ashore. Earle Williams essays the leading role, the author of "Memories that Haunt," who is separated from his wife, Isobel (Rose Tapley). The cast in support is made up of the leading Vitagraph stock players, which assures a superior production in all respects.

A SON OF THE SEA (Cines), April 7.—This is a two-reel offering embracing a strong love story, containing many scenes that are intense and interesting, which hold the closest attention. It shows the mental and physical strife between two competing firms for a mammoth contract, both, however, imbued with honor and fair dealing. Eventually the heads of the firms (the fathers) are drawn together in the mesh of love woven about the son of one and the daughter of the other. A clear and worthy offering that is splendidly accomplished by the producers.

CAPTURED BY THE MEXICANS (Kalem), April 8.—A two-reel offering that depicts supreme ingratitude on the part of a native Mexican who has been rescued from death by a couple of Americans. It introduces the federal and rebel contingents . Although it has inconsistences in it, it is an exciting picture.

LORD ALGY (Lubin), April 8.—Lawrence S. McCloskey has created in this two-reel photoplay a real interesting and amusing production. Arthur Johnson not only has produced it worthily, but he portrays the title role in a natural and realistic manner. He is ably supported by Lottie Briscoe and a superior cast. This can be classed as one of the few two-part comedies that sustains true merit and hearty laughs to the finale. Howard M. Mitchell as the valet deserves great credit. Algy has a more than strenuous time of it—but he is "game," and wins out.

THE GREATER LOVE (Pathe), April 9.—This story in two reels, picturing the love of a young wife for the sailor boy she had thought dead, is admirably handled throughout. The scenes at the last, where she goes down over the cliff to rescue her lover and the remarkable climb up the side, with the jealous husband threatening to cut the rope, are intensely fascinating. One of the best pictures of this type shown in a long while. The fore part of the story, in which the sailor goes away and the girl marries, is conventionally pictured, but entertaining. A good offering.

THE ROOT OF EVIL (Lubin), April 9.—A two-reel number, depicting some of the tragic results that often follow from impoverished circumstances. The girl's marriage to an elderly man of wealth is but one phase of the plot. The weakness of the picture seems to be that it attempts too much, but the story follows fairly well after the characters are identified in the mind of the observer. The naturalness of settings and incidents, particularly in the first part, is pleasing, but the characters did not seem to put enough feeling into their work. The photograph is good.

IN THE MOON'S RAY (Essanay), April 10.—This two-reel photoplay is one that is filled with occurrences that are not entertaining or satisfying. To the spectator who sits through it it is disgusting. The poor moon should not be made responsible for throwing its rays on such a conception. Robbery, abduction, attempted murder, etc., etc., and then some impossible and improbable situations take place. This picture must be seen to get the full melodramatic flavor.

THE IMPERSONATOR (Edison), April 10.—This is heralded as a drama of Washington life and is adapted into picture form from a novel of the same caption written by Mary Imlay Taylor. Gertrude McCoy essays a dual role, the mother and the daughter. This picture has nothing in it in common to interest the ordinary everyday goer to picture shows. The development of the plot is in an environment that concerns only those who have nothing to do but worry. Nothing but praise can be said for the camera work and the acting.

DETECTIVE KELLY (Pathe), April 11.—A two-reel plot that is strenuous enough to satisfy the most exacting observer who appreciates thrills. There are several situations in this offering that are ridiculous. The idea of one man covering a room full of desperate characters and driving them out is farcical. A race between an automobile and a fast freight train eats up a heap of film and finally the automobile is left on a crossing to wreck the train(?). Kelly gets his man. This is a thrilling picture even if it does contain absurdities. The photography is first class.

THE GIRL FROM PROSPERITY (Vitagraph), April 11.—The plot of this two-reel offering is not only ably developed, but the portrayal of the leading role by Billy Quirk is edifying and distinctive. Prosperity is a country town wherein the character, Billy, was born and raised. He has longings for greater thought, however, and leaving his girl in Prosperity, decides to try his luck in the city. He tries and is glad eventually to get back to the town that spells Prosperity. It is a splendid comedy and well acted and visualized.

THE CHERRY PICKERS (Selig), April 13.—This is a strong, splendidly visualized version of the play of the same caption, that was so popular on Broadway and afterward throughout the country. To say it is well done is speaking mildly. One forgets in viewing that it is a picture, and when it is ended realizes he is on the edge of the seat.

THE WILES OF A SIREN (Kalem), April 13.—A pretentious two-reel offering that grows stronger as it progresses on the screen. There is, of course, a love interest that is full of tribulations and terminates satisfactorily in the finale. Several tense scenes are shown. Suspicion on the part of a foolish husband is the cause of all the trouble. This is a good number.

Independent

IT CAME BY FREIGHT (Royal), April 11.—On the same reel with "Hubby's Surprise," is a would-be comical number based on the old mother-in-law theme.

HUBBY'S SURPRISE (Royal), April 11.—This is a laughable production that is not new, by any means, as several other photoplays have been based on the same theme. On the same reel with "It Came by Freight."

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 13 (Reliance), April 13.—This takes Norma Phillips among St. Patrick's Day parades, and numerous other interesting and topical incidents greet her at various places.

TOO MUCH TURKEY (Princess), April 13.—An appealing comedy that concerns a newly married couple that are hard-up on Thanksgiving Day. Each determines they must have a turkey and secretly they determine to make a sacrifice to surprise the other. How they come out in the end is laughable; just for a minute it is almost tragic. The finale is highly satisfactory. This is a clean little comedy.

HIS PUNISHMENT (Majestic), April 14.—The picture is somewhat hectic in conception and execution and the plot is not exactly pleasant. The chases are realistic and exciting.

LURED FROM SQUASH CENTER (Powers), April 14.—Another burlesque on the white slave film stories. Mrs. Stuart Robson plays the part of a country girl who is lured to the city. There is nothing offensive in this, but the idea seems to have already been pretty well worked out.

THE RIGHT DOPE (Komic), April 15.—A comedy of the usual merit of this brand, directed by Eddie Dillon, who also plays a part in the production. Fay Tincher essays the leading finale role. It is laughable.

A NARROW SQUEAK (Joker), April 18.—There is material here for a good story, but the plot is not worked up very strongly. The makeup of the two tramps is pleasing and the squealing pig in the gate and other rural features should have been a source of greater amusement than they produce. In spite of its slow movement and uncertain plot the film contains many scenes of interest.

AN INFANT HEART SNATCHER (Thanhouser), April 19.—This is a photoplay that contains more than the usual originality of plot, if it can be called plot. The incidental revolves around a baby who is stranded in a boarding house with its actress mother. If a baby ever received attention this one got its full share. There is both sentiment and comedy happily blended, and human characters make up the cast. It is well done in every respect.

HOW TO KEEP A HUSBAND (Crystal), April 19.—Quite a novel idea is brought out in this comedy number. By use of an invention called the "Attractor," either the wife or husband can immediately summon the other at will. The wife calls the husband when he is holding four aces in a card game. Vivian Prescott and Charlie De Forrest appear in this amusing offering.

ON SUSPICION (Rex), April 19.—A unique elopement, in which the bride-to-be rides in an automobile, handcuffed to the detective her irate father sent after her. She gets rid of the handcuff and jumps from one car to another, while both are running at top speed. Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley appear in this offering, which is an interesting novelty.

THE LION (Victor), April 20.—J. Warren Kerrigan and Vera Sisson appear in this number. Kerrigan plays the part of a young man with a murderous temper. He is led to believe he has killed a man and becomes known as "The Coward," but later when the truth is known he turns loose and whips a whole gang of cowboys who have been mocking him. This makes an entertaining yarn and is well constructed.

CHARLIE'S RIVAL (Crystal), April 21.—A story of rivalry between two men over a girl. The photography is good, but the plot rather stereotyped and contains nothing very new.

SI PUTS ONE OVER (Crystal), April 21.—This, on the same reel with above, is also rather skimpy in plot. Belmont's characterization of the country boy is the best feature, but the action of the piece does not amount to much.

WHEN UNIVERSAL IKE SET (Universal Ike), April 21.—This shows Ike as the husband of a woman who owns a chicken ranch. He is lazy and feigns paralysis, and the wife places eggs in the bed, which hatch out in due course of time. Low comedy with a pleasing ranch setting and humor of a characteristic sort.

DAVID GRAY'S ESTATE (American), April 22.—This photoplay depicts the scenes described in the poem. David Gray is a hard working blacksmith, who, as he works, thinks with envy of the ease of the Rich Man. His dream of envy is suddenly disturbed by the clang of the village firebell and the word spreads that the school house is afire. David Gray leaves his forge and runs up the road crazed with fear for the safety of his children. That night as The Rich Man sits in his home, wifeless and childless, David Gray stood looking down at his children, safe and sound asleep in their beds.

LUTIE'S LOVERS (Joker), April 22.—A low comedy number picturing the love affairs of a very plump girl named Lutie. Some of the character makeups are good, particularly that of Willie Walrus. The action includes falling in ponds, mud throwing and the like. It does not at any time become very funny.

THE STRANGER AT HICKORY NUT GAP (Imp), April 23.—This is a moonshiner story, written by Monte Katterjohn. Wm. E. Shay, Frank Herzog and Ona Hungerford have the leading roles. The story is conventional in type, but has the correct atmosphere. At the end the detective takes the girl away with him to the city.

A NEIGHBORLY QUARREL (Frontier), April 23.—This is a Western number of an eccentric character. The plot is not sufficiently defined to hold the interest and seems almost meaningless in places. The photography is good and the scenes sufficiently attractive to have been employed to better advantage.

RISEN FROM THE ASHES (Rex), April 23.—The plot in this is new enough to prove enjoyable. The young wife, thinking her husband dead, collects the insurance money and successfully continues his business. His return was well pictured and their formation of a partnership seemed quite the proper thing. An entertaining number.

THE TAINT OF AN ALIEN (Powers), April 24.—A film story featuring Edwin August as a student of criminology. He is injured in a saloon brawl and at the hospital has the blood of a criminal transfused into his system. This leads him to commit a crime. The scenes are developed rather jerkily, but the story holds considerable interest.

THEIR HONEYMOON (Nestor), April 24.—The real bride and groom exchange places unintentionally with a pair of lunatics who think they are newlyweds. The resulting situations afford lots of action and plenty of fun of its kind. Many of the scenes are taken on the grounds of an insane asylum. All of the Nestor principals participate.

NUGGET NELL'S WARD (Frontier), April 25.—This is not overly fresh as to plot, but it has a lot of good scenic effects, plenty of action and tells a rounded story. It concerns the ownership of a rich mine, which was sold to the orphan girl's father before his death. There is a risky jump between automobiles going at full speed toward the close.

THE SHARPS WANT A FLAT (Joker), April 25.—Max Asher and his wife search for a flat. They possess a large family of animals, which will lend a certain interest to the film. The story itself does not get over very strongly.

ALMOST A BRIDEGROOM (Crystal), April 26.—This is a low comedy number with a domestic setting. The mothers try to prevent a marriage between the young couple. One of them is detained away from home and the old man "baches" it. The humor in this is very thin and it does not make a strong offering.

MOUNTAIN LAW (Rex), April 26.—Here is a first class story of a mountain feud, with Robert Leonard and Hazel Buckham on opposing sides of the conflict. This is full of action and holds the interest strongly. The girl shoots her lover during the feud as the result of a misunderstanding, giving the picture a tragic close.

WILLIE AND THE MUSE (Eclair), April 26.—A film story enacted by children, in the makeup of the days when knighthood was in flower. The young actors are clever and the scenes are nicely pictured, but this offering does not come up to former successes along the same line. However, it will interest many observers.

SPOTTED (Crystal), April 28.—This half reel comedy gets up quite a lot of laughter. It concerns the adventures of a married couple who engage the services of a male and female detective to spy on one another. The eccentric chase is funny.

FOR THE LOVE OF BALDY (Crystal), April 28.—This, on same reel with above, pictures Baldy Belmont on a picnic. The photography is good and there are some entertaining rural scenes. An entertaining bit.

Independent Specials

THE MUSICIAN'S DAUGHTER (Thanhouser), April 14.—A two-part picture by Maude Fealy, who plays the lead. The incompatibility of a true artist and a social butterfly lead to complications which result in sorrow and death. A wealthy violinist falls in love with a society girl. A daughter is born and at the age of four she is an apt pupil in her father's art. The wife refuses to accompany the violinist on a tour and during his absence runs away with a banker, taking her daughter with her. Broken-hearted, the violinist goes to America, where fate restores his daughter to him.

THIEVES (Domino), April 16.—Melodramatic in tone, it carries two stories, one of prosperity and one of dire poverty and distress. They are worked out in the finale into the same grove in a clever manner that is satisfying. The two reels are filled with exciting moments. The direction of the picture is well done as is the acting and photography.

LOVE VS. DUTY (Kay-Bee), April 17.—The plot of this two-reel film is good and there is an effort to make the story seem true to life. Acting and characterization suffer from exaggeration.

MABEL AT THE WHEEL (Keystone), April 18.—Mabel Normand "gets over" finely in this two-reel comedy. It abounds in funny situations and is characterized throughout by that swiftness of action which has made Keystone comedies so popular.

MISS NOBODY FROM NOWHERE (Imp), April 20.—A two-reel number, featuring Ethel Grandin as a slum girl who afterward becomes a dancer. Miss Grandin makes the most of her part and proves interesting. The story is not a very strong one and is rather obvious in plot. The close is pleasing.

THE WIDOW'S INVESTMENT (American), April 20.—A two-part picture. Two get-rich-quick financiers of the Wallingford type decide to form a fake oil company. They settle at Santa Maria, California. Widow Green of Santa Maria invests her husband's insurance money in the fake oil company and soon after her son Eben goes to work on the oil drills. He falls in love with Marjorie, daughter of Stubbs, the head driller. Stubbs strikes oil, but for a money consideration agrees to keep the fact from the shareholders, who, ignorant of the strike, will sell for the amount of the assessment. Eben learns of the strike and by a ruse buys the assessment and gets control of the company. Sydney Ayres and Vivian Rich play the leads.

A DRAMA OF THE DESERT (Eclair), April 22.—A two-reel number, put on by the European Eclair company. The story concerns the love affairs of Fatma, to whose hand the bandit Mohammed aspires. The opening scenes are none too clearly pictured, but the production becomes much stronger in interest as the story advances. The views of the native ceremonies in the grove of palms were very attractive. The latter portion of this number is well worth while, though as a whole the story is not exceptional.

LOVE AND VENGEANCE (Sterling), April 23.—A review of this fine two-reel farce-comedy will be found in the issue of April 18.

OLD CALIFORNIA (Gold Seal), April 25.—A two-reel story of the early romantic days in California, written by Robert Thornby. Edwin August appears in the double role of a cavalier and his son, the story extending over a long period of years. Alice Rhodes and Helen Case have the leading feminine parts. The settings are colorful and attractive and the lapses of time are well accounted for by the changed appearance of the characters. The story itself breaks at the end of the first reel and then starts again. It makes a fairly entertaining offering.

MONSTER AND GIRL (Solax).—This four-part melodrama is staged by Madame Blache. There are several sensational incidents in the course of the story. One of these is the escape of a crook across a line suspended between two houses and the fall of another. The third reel is good. In this part there is an attempted bank robbery in which the thieves saw through a rather thin wooden floor.

THE REDEMPTION OF DAVID CORSON (Famous Players), April 10.—In this four-part subject the lead is played by William Farnum, who gives a strong interpretation of the role of the Quaker with high ideals and great powers of oratory, but who later falls through infatuation for a gypsy already married to Dr. Paracelsus, a traveling cure-all. The story fails to create deep interest; there is absent the quality to convince. Corson, of course, must have a weak strain in him, in spite of the moral courage he displays in the early stages of the picture. Possibly had Constance Molineaux, who played Papeeta, the gypsy, been directed to use animation and even fire in her work rather than to pursue the dumb, the staring, the unwomanlike attitude, the result might have been for the better. Hal Clarendon, the converted lumberman, gives a fine performance, and so also does Robert Broderick as Dr. Paracelsus. There are many good scenes of open snow-covered country, and many people are used in the production. The photography is not strong.

NOT A DOGGONE THING WRONG.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: Please find inclosed money order for $3, payment for renewal of subscription for Moving Picture World. I suppose you get a little weary at times reading so many letters of praise, but I wish to add my little mite by saying that I would as soon think of running a house without a screen as I would without my Moving Picture World.

I really think that your Projection Department and your Hand Book have done more to improve projection than all the rest of the picture game dope put together. The questions and answers now running in the Projection Department are surely a great help to the exhibitor in my position—with a small plant of his own.

Advertising for the Exhibitors and Comments on the Films are a world of help, too. In fact, I can't see a doggone thing wrong with the whole magazine. Hop to it. May all the success that is bound to be yours sooner or later hurry up and get there. Orpheum Theater, A. J. Bishell, Mgr.

ONE of the few first productions I have ever seen in which careful work, coupled with intelligence, has made as straight for success as if backed by years of experience, "The Banker's Daughter" will rank high among photodramas of the day, among the best five-reel features now being shown.

Edward M. Roskam and William Haddock deserve warm congratulations for the high professional quality of their respective, and possibly their united, labors of production. They have far exceeded the expectations of their best friends. The types chosen, especially the men, are admirable; the acting is intense and consistent, the treatment is of refined beauty, and the scenario form unusually good.

"The Banker's Daughter" is one of a series of plays in which the late Bronson Howard, dean of American dramatists, dealt with American character in foreign atmosphere. They concerned social amenities and were all too frequently cast in a mold that has made most of them easily forgotten, despite the fact that there was always a distinct idea beneath his stories, one more worthy of preservation than his popular methods. He probably wrote for what there was in it and got what he was after, but he could not repress brilliant characteristics sown by many other American dramatists who found their way to playwriting through journalism. Nor could he repress a certain depth of thought that saved such an outworn theme as that of "The Banker's Daughter" from failure. It is the story of the girl who marries a rich suitor to save her father from financial dishonor, barely escapes perilous relations with a more favored suitor, and ends by falling in love with her wealthy husband. It has been used so many times in French dramas that it ought to be pensioned.

Beneath Bronson Howard's treatment of the subject is a powerful object lesson that is felt rather than seen, and this is carefully preserved in the photodrama. The banker's daughter is not an unnatural woman at heart. To the contrary, she typifies an enormous number of American women who only "find themselves" after some disillusioning experience, or some bitter trial, and who are late in rendering justice to men who have done everything possible to fill their lives with happiness. Such a woman as the young wife in "The Banker's Daughter" has her own way at home before marriage, because her parents are fond to the point of indulgence, and she expects to be humored and know no restraint by the man she marries.

Such women are unready, if they are not wholly unfit, for marriage. They possibly do not intend to be particularly selfish, but the good that is in them remains latent because there is nothing in home life to call it into activity. They are proud of the health and beauty that has been provided for them and learn to regard themselves as the center of all interests. Such women fail in any test of natural affection, unhesitatingly despoil the lives of those around them and eventually reach an isolation for which they blame every one but themselves.

"The Banker's Daughter" is a thorough and just criticism of an American condition. Beneath the surface incidents lies this idea, and it is admirably reflected in the photodrama, if, indeed, it is not more clearly enforced. Bronson Howard was a believer in vital ideas, and it was on that solid foundation that he established the American drama's existence. He, in his day, exactly conformed to the idea of Bernard Shaw, "The drama is one of the greatest instrumentalities in the world for teaching people to see and hear properly. It should be employed to show the events of life in their spiritual and actual relation to each other."

MORE AFRAID OF THE DIRECTOR THAN OF THE SNAKES.

Lilie Leslie, who recently starred in the big Lubin versions of the Chas. Klein plays, has proven herself not only a very talented actress but an accomplished snake charmer as well. In a forthcoming Lubin release, entitled "The Pythoness," Miss Leslie handles three twelve-foot pythons, a Texas bull snake and a Jersey pine snake, five in all. The final scene of the play closes with the snakes coiled around the body of "The Pythoness" and slowly choking her to death.

Before the making of this very realistic picture Miss Leslie had never seen a snake at close quarters except in the zoo and with a very substantial barrier between her and danger.

Just before the snake scene Joe Smiley, the director of the picture, took her over and introduced her to the snakes. She fearlessly took off her glove and took one of the snakes. When it was all over Smiley said, "You're a brave little girl; weren't you afraid?" Miss Leslie replied, "No, I was not afraid of the snake, I was afraid you would say, 'Well, what's the matter with you? Why don't you pick it up and play with it?'" And Joe only smiled at the comeback.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

E. E. BLAKE, London, Eugland, the Eastman representative in that city, arrived in New York by the S. S. Imperator, March 19. After spending a few days in the metropolis, he proceeded to the company's plant in Rochester, N. Y., and thence came on to Chicago, where he renewed acquaintance with several old friends whom he had met in London. Chief among these was Col. Wm. N. Selig, who contributed largely to the pleasure of his three days' stay.

E. E. Blake.

Mr. Blake is a strapping young man, full of vim and possessed of a personality that wins friends wherever he goes. He was on "the go" all the time he was here and visited all the film manufacturers in the city. He returned to Rochester the evening of April 3rd.

I learned from Mr. Blake that he has been connected with the film business, in one capacity or another, since 1897. In those days, when a seventy-foot film was considered a wonder, he owned his own show, comprised of moving pictures, and traveled throughout the English provinces. He bought his pictures outright, at 12 cents a foot, as renting was unknown at the time. The first four pictures exhibited by him were: "A Snowball Fight" and "French Cavalry on the March" by Lumiere, and "A Man Burning Weeds" and "Waves Breaking Into a Cave" by Robert Paul. The length of these subjects varied from forty to seventy feet.

For the last nine years Mr. Blake has been connected with the Eastman Kodak Company, handling its film product in Europe, with London as headquarters. With the characteristic conservatism of the Eastman force connected with the cine department, Mr. Blake had little to say except that the film product of the Eastman Kodak Company is more widely used in Europe than that of any other company, and that it is almost exclusively used in the United Kingdom. He stated that fully 60 per cent. of the moving pictures shown in the United Kingdom are of American manufacture.

Mr. Blake's visit to the United States was made with the object of getting better acquainted with the home plant of the company, and to study the conditions of moving picture manufacturing in America. He expressed great pleasure with the splendid reception given him everywhere since his arrival. All the important manufacturers of moving pictures in the United States placed their plants at his disposal for inspection, and everywhere he had been greeted cordially and most hospitably entertained.

Mr. Blake specially requested me to state in this article that he wished to have all his American friends and those connected with the film business call on him at the Kodak Building, on Kingsway, London, should they ever pay that metropolis a visit. He will be glad to furnish any information required, and otherwise, as far as in his power, to make their stays pleasant. Mr. Blake, practically, knows everybody in the moving picture manufacturing line, in the United Kingdom and on the Continent, and has also a wide acquaintance among those in the renting business.

He is a close friend of E. H. Montagu, Selig's European representative in London, to whom he bears expressions of kindest regard from a host of old Chicago friends. Mr. Blake sailed from New York on his home trip, on the S. S. Campania, April 15th.

Theatrical Hospital for Chicago.

For some time past a movement has been afoot in the local amusement world to interest the various branches of the profession in establishing a theatrical hospital in Chicago. This desirable and laudable enterprise is now well under way and funds are being secured through popular subscriptions, the giving of benefit entertainments and membership dues.

Fifty thousand dollars will be issued in bonds of a denomination of $10 each. These bonds will be redeemed one-tenth each year for ten years, until the entire issue is retired. Subscriptions for membership in the association will be issued for $1.00 a year, and a life membership will be sold for $25.00. The funds, raised as mentioned, will be used for the construction of a modern hospital, located at the corner of Monroe Street and Hoyne Avenue, which will be known as the American Theatrical Hospital.

It is the purpose of the organization having these matters in charge to secure medical and surgical aid and hospital treatment for all persons connected with the amusement profession. Photoplayers, moving picture operators, and, in fact, anybody identified with the moving picture industry, whether manufacturing, selling or exhibiting, will be included.

Provision will be made in the new hospital for five free wards, containing three beds each; and, if more are needed, two additional rooms, with three beds each, will be added, making a total of twenty-one beds.

The hospital will not be exclusively charitable, as regular rates will be charged to patrons who can afford to pay; but the man without work and without funds, who is taken sick and must have hospital treatment, will be taken care of in this hospital free of charge.

Doctor Max Thorek, one of the best-known surgeons in Chicago, will head the medical faculty of forty doctors and surgeons. A training school for nurses will also be established in connection with the hospital.

The following board of directors has been elected: Joseph Hopp, president; Adolph Marks, the well-known theatrical lawyer, first vice-president; Municipal Judge Charles N. Goodnow, second vice-president; Superior Judge John P. McGoorty, treasurer, and Charles Andress, Chicago manager of the Billboard, secretary. Other members of the board are: Aaron A. Jones, of Jones, Linick & Schaefer; Charles E. Kohl, general manager of the Western Vaudeville Managers' Association; the Rev. Francis Martin, and William Warren, president of the Bill Posters' Union.

In addition to the efforts of the organization, a ladies' auxiliary is doing excellent work in raising money through benefit entertainments. A monster benefit entertainment will be given at the Auditorium, May 24th. The Musicians' Union has offered a hundred of their members to furnish the music for this benefit. All the shows playing Chicago's large theaters at the time will contribute talent for the entertainment. It may also be mentioned that a number of applications have been received by the board from private persons and firms, who have offered to donate funds to equip the free wards in the hospital. Such wards will be named after the donors.

Until the new hospital building is ready, the American Theatrical Hospital will be conducted on the premises of the old American Hospital.

Studebaker to be Opened by "The Spoilers."

Harry J. Powers, local representative of Charles Frohman, Klaw & Erlanger, lessees of the Studebaker Theater, denied last week that the house is to be turned over to the moving picture interests.

"The lease of the Studebaker has not been transferred," he said. "The Lake View Amusement Company, a subsidiary organization, acting in conjunction with Frohman, Klaw & Erlanger, is the lessee of the Studebaker Theater and will continue to operate the house for regular dramatic and musical attractions of the better class for the next five years.

"Negotiations are pending for the presentation of high-class motion pictures from April 20th until September 21st. Klaw & Erlanger will book $2 attractions as usual after the summer months, beginning in September."

This statement was issued in denial of the rumor widely circulated that the firm of Jones, Linick & Schaefer, lessees of the Colonial and McVicker's Theaters, as well as many houses built for moving pictures and vaudeville, would operate the Studebaker in future. The Studebaker came into the possession of Frohman, Klaw & Erlanger at the beginning of the present theatrical season, having been operated previously by William Conor, formerly connected with the firm of Liebler & Co. The lease from the owners of the Fine Arts Building, proprietors of the house, provides that it shall be used only for the presentation of first-class dramatic and musical attractions.

Selig's great production, "The Spoilers," has been secured by Jones, Linick & Schaefer to open the house on April 20th.

Rumored Acquirement of the Princess for Pictures.

Alfred Hamburger, owner of a chain of moving picture houses, announced on Friday, April 10th, that he had leased the Princess Theater from William A. Brady for variety and moving pictures. He declared he would take possession May 1st.

William A. Brady, who is in New York, denied by wire that he had leased the Princess to Hamburger or any one else, or that he had any intention of doing so.

John Garrity, local representative of the Shubert interests, declared that if Mr. Brady were to lease the theater he would break his own lease with Mort H. Singer, which prohibits sub-leasing.

"When I took the Ziegfeld I got an option on the Princess, so that I could take that, too, if I succeeded with the first theater," Mr. Hamburger said. "The option is in writing and in legal form. Mr. Brady is responsible for what he signs, and I have written him that I intend to exercise my option and take possession May 1st. And, on May 1st, I will take possession."

"We will run a summer show and have already arranged bookings for next season," said Mr. Brady in New York. "Pictures in the Princess! I guess not."

"It's all news to me," said John Garrity. "It is peculiar how theaters can be leased when the owners and lessees and their lawyers and every one interested have never heard a word about it."

Mr. Hamburger declined to make public the length of the lease, but from an authentic source it was learned that it was for approximately ten years. It is understood that the price to be paid Mr. Brady will be $150,000. Moving pictures, probably, will be installed at the close of the Blinn players' engagement.

During the run of the "Scarlet Letter" at the Ziegfeld the attendance has been very large, averaging over 2,000 per day. Mr. Hamburger is confident that his policy will work out profitably in other large Chicago theaters.

Chicago theaters now under the control of Mr. Hamburger are the Princess, the Ziegfeld, the Twentieth Century, the Drexel, the Apollo, the Ellis, the Shakespeare and the Langley Hippodrome.

In addition to these interests, Mr. Hamburger is president of the Louise Amusement Company and of the Alfred Theater Company, which control twenty-seven theaters in Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin. He is also president of the New York and Western Booking Association and of the Celebrated Players' Film Company.

Suit has been filed in the Circuit Court against Mayor Carter H. Harrison, William H. Sexton, Corporation Counsel, and James Gleason, General Superintendent of Police, by William C. Clingen, Charles H. "The theater ventilation fight is being won slowly," says the bulletin of the health department for last week. "In the last month nineteen unventilated theaters either installed ventilation or went out of business. The public is learning to look for the health department's certificates of clean air before buying tickets for the show houses."

Mayor Harrison revoked the theater license of Walter Wasniak, 4921 South Ashland Avenue, a moving picture house proprietor, and also revoked the license of his operator, Anthony Mitchell, on complaint of Second Deputy Funkhouser, on April 8th. Major Funkhouser declared that Wasniak displayed two films not licensed by the censor board, and that licenses issued for other films were attached to them.

The commercial, industrial, educational and social resources of the southeastern states are to be pictured upon several thousand feet of films and brought to Chicago to illustrate reports of conditions in that section of the United States. The moving pictures will be taken by an expert cameraman, who will accompany the trade extension committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce, the members of which left Sunday, April 12th, for a two weeks' trip through Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, the Carolinas, Florida, Alabama and Mississippi.

Marion Gabe, formerly on the business force of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD and late on the reportorial staff of the Chicago American, has been appointed traveling representative for the Celebrated Players Film Company. Mr. Gabe is doing well with several big features in outside cities, Jack London's "The Sea Wolf" among them.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, arrived in the city from the Santa Barbara plant April 9th, and expects to remain for several weeks. His family accompanied him. Mr. Hutchinson stated that the three western companies are kept busy all the time and that weather conditions are good. He is enthusiastic over the coming releases of the company, which he pronounces the best subjects yet turned out. He attributes this higher quality to the effect of refined environment on the actors, which inspires them to better work. He informed me that the demand for the American Beauty films is growing very rapidly, and that the volume of complimentary letters received at the general office gives cause for much gratification. Several new people have been added to the Beauty film stock company.

Miss Gladys Hulette

THIS dainty little lady has been charming photoplay-goers for the last three years by her delightful impersonations. Although extremely young, she has had a most enviable career, having appeared with Bertha Kalich in the "Kreutzer Sonata," and Mme. Nazimova in "The Doll's House," playing the part of a boy in both performances. Another well known star with whom she has appeared is Henry Miller. In the "Blue Bird" she played a most difficult part, which was highly praised by the critics and won her immediate distinction. The fact that she was a mere child at the time and that the part, as she naively expressed it, was "much longer than Hamlet," placed Miss Hulette in that dangerous category known as youthful prodigy. But she has defied the law of gravity and is still rising instead of sinking out of sight as do most brilliant performers of tender years. Her last appearance on the stage was made in 1911 in "Little Women," in which she played Beth. Since that time she has devoted all her energy to Edison photoplays, her youth and beauty winning her countless admirers.

Gladys Hulette.

Although always charming in comedy, Miss Hulette loves drama best. She has a wealth of emotional expression at her command that imparts to her work a feeling of absolute sincerity. In "On the Heights," the sixth "Dolly" story, her pathos and fine dramatic portrayal are sure to make a strong appeal. Her artistic presentation of various roles in "The Younger Generation," "The Double Shadow," "Courting Betty's Beau," "Falling in Love with Inez' 'and "Why Girls Leave Home" is indicative of the high quality of her work. "How Bobby Called Her Bluff" and "The Embarrassment of Riches," in which she played the Irish laborer's daughter, show her to be irresistible as a comedienne.

Having always desired to play the part of a princess, Miss Hulette recently turned authoress herself and wrote "A Royal Romance," in which she so exquisitely portrayed the young princess who fell in love with a penniless physician. It is a role full of pathos, in which Miss Hulette is seen at her best.

Filled with the fire of a youthful ambition, richly endowed with exceptional talent and possessed of that indescribable something called "magnetism," Gladys Hulette is destined to fill a high position among the leading actresses of the photoplay world.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

HAD a most pleasant chat last week with George P. Hamilton, veteran moving picture man, now president of the Albuquerque Film Manufacturing Company—and general manager, too. Mr. Hamilton was in New York for ten days on business connected with his company, and he admitted that New York had looked mighty good to him, that he likes the noise and hum of Broadway, the lights and the crowds, and also that he enjoys nothing better than meeting old friends. He said he was already beginning to feel the lure of the West, however, and that he was anxious to get into harness again, in other words a khaki suit and the trappings of the field. When the head of the Albuquerque company is in town the first thing about him that strikes you is that he knows how to wear clothes; and the next is that he is a most agreeable man to meet.

Mr. Hamilton is producing three-reel pictures which are being released through Warner's Features. His first two subjects were "The First Law of Nature" and "Trail of the Law," the reception of which by the public has been very gratifying to him. The company is featuring Miss Dot Farley, whose versatility has been shown in her engagements with the Essanay, American, St. Louis and Pioneer companies before she joined the Albuquerque. There are two big productions now under way, Mr. Hamilton says, pictures he believes will please the public. They carry a Mexican atmosphere, and in their making the company received material aid from the United States soldiers on duty on the Mexican frontier. Buck Connors, sometimes known as "King of the Cowboys," arranged matters with the army men, and as a result there were transferred to the film some stirring cavalry charges. There was a mix-up in one of these that put five men in the hospital and cost the company $1,500 for doctor's bills.

"Everybody is all right now, though," said Mr. Hamilton, "as well as ever. The accident happened when the horse ridden by Paul Machette stepped in a hole about twenty-five feet from the camera. The animal stumbled, but Paul got him out. Before he could get the horse going again, however, it was struck by four other riders, and the whole bunch went down. The cameraman was game—those fellows have to be, seem to think that is part of their job—and he got the whole story as it happened right in front of him. It ought to furnish a real thrill."

Mr. Hamilton says his company for the present is working at its studio in Los Angeles, but that a few months each year it will make its quarters in the neighborhood of Albuquerque, a number of the business men of which town are interested in the organization. Mr. Hamilton said he intended on his way back to Los Angeles to stop off at Chicago and pick up a new camera and other equipment. He was accompanied by his son, George P. Hamilton, Jr., who for several weeks had been in New York, during which time he had made a study of selling methods and had had placed at his disposal the entire organization of Warner's Features.

Franklin B. Coates, who has recently returned from South America, where as a member of the Captain Besley expedition he experienced for months the hardships of travel through the jungle and down uncharted torrential streams, met King Baggot in the Screen Club on Monday. It was the first time the two men had shaken hands since the president of the Screeners last May in London bid the explorer good-bye. There were reminiscences of London and then Mr. Baggot pumped questions into the traveler. The answers that were returned would make mighty interesting reading, but Mr. Coates is preparing magazine articles on his experiences. As Mr. Baggot was lighting a cigarette he asked Mr. Coates what he did for smoking material when for many weeks his party was out of touch with civilization. "Why," was the reply, "we did just what some boys have been known to do—we simply put fern leaves in the sun. In five minutes they would be dry. Then we crushed them and rolled them in large damp leaves—and we had a smoke—not much of a one, to be sure, but a smoke, nevertheless." And every man in the party smiled knowingly, just as if he had first-hand knowledge of the subject.

Here's a picture of Ben Goetz, the manager of the Crystal Studio up in the Bronx. It's the only one ever taken, and this is a first run. As we said a couple of weeks ago, Mr. Goetz has recently taken unto himself a wife; so it is the natural thing that his friends—and here's a fellow that knows how to make them—should drag him out into the light of publicity, as, of course, when a man marries he is expected to shed his retiring ways. Mr. Goetz has recently been seized with an ambition to direct the making of pictures. He was so successful in his initial attempt that now the boss up at the Crystal makes him make 'em. Well, Ben has some original comedy ideas, and he'll have plenty of chance to get them out of his system and consequently into ours. Here's good luck to him in his business and many years of happiness in his home!

In "For His Master," the two-months'-old two-reel Reliance subject, Fred Burns gives a fine portrayal of the back district parson. It is no milk-and-water interpretation he gives us; it is of a red-blooded, virile individual who not only knows what he wants in the community, but has the sand, the force of character, to go out and take it. Directors there be who make of their clergymen anaemic, frail, shrinking, affected adult males with little of the characteristics of a man. Is it possible that those responsible for the screen caricatures of clergymen with which we are so often afflicted never meet any of the genuine article and consequently give us a representation of what they think the man of God must be? Director Cabanne put on "For His Master."

Mary Charming Charleson was present at the Vitagraph Theater on the night of the change in bill. It was the first evening in nine weeks that she had not been on the stage in "The Honeymooners." She was very much on the screen, however, as Marina Paoli in "Mr. Barnes of New York."

In "The Girl from Prosperity," the two-reel drama in which Billy Quirk makes his Vitagraph debut, the comedian shows us what he can do in stuff other than comedy. To be sure, he makes a comedy-drama out of this subject, but the main theme is never lost to view. Even the sub-titles were made to fit or it just happened that they did fit Billy's more or less volcanic vocabulary—they seemed, in fact, coming from his lips. In situations of pathos he was especially effective—all the more so to those of us to whom it was a suddenly revealed power. He received splendid support from Anita Stewart. It was too bad that she was made to assume such a flippant attitude in the final scene—it was hardly in keeping with the really sterling character of the manicure girl, as we had watched its development through the picture.

Arthur Johnson's portrayal of the title role in "Lord Algy" in Lubin's two-reeler is a fine bit of work. His interpretation of the exceedingly deliberate Englishman is convincing and delightful. Probably nowhere will Lawrence S. McCloskey's picture be more popular than in England.

"The Master Rogue."

A Two-Part Kalem Feature of Meritorious Character.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THERE is no surplusage in this film, it is all action and quality. It has besides the added merit of being novel and in the best sense of the word, sensational.

George H. Melford, who directed the picture and who plays a double part with uncommon skill, is entitled to no small credit. He was equally fine and convincing in both parts; as the blind boy he was patient and gentle and displayed in a most artistic way that strange dignity which comes to the blind as part of the compensation for their terrible misfortune. As the wicked brother he gave a most excellent portrayal of the rough, unscrupulous and daring rogue and criminal, who delights in schemes of fraud and welcomes violence when stealth will no longer serve. The story in brief is as follows: The physical resemblance between Albert and Frank, twin brothers, is startling. Mentally and morally, however, the two are wide apart. Albert is the leader of a criminal band, while Frank, blind, sells papers for a livelihood.

Frank is injured by an automobile owned by Prentice, a retired banker. The man takes Frank to his own home. Louise, the banker's daughter, becomes interested in Frank.

Scene from "The Master Rogue" (Kalem).

Albert meanwhile engages in a smuggling expedition. Discovered by revenue officials, the man has an encounter with them, but escapes. He learns of what has befallen Frank.

The Prentices adopt the blind boy as a member of their family. The banker later offers a reward of $20,000 to the physician who will restore Frank's sight. At the behest of Albert, Armstrong, an unscrupulous doctor, offers his services.

Buddy, one of the gang, is deeply attached to Frank. He discovers that the blind boy is to be victimized by the unscrupulous brother. Prentice and Louise bring Frank to Armstrong's office. There the blind man is kidnapped by Albert's gang, and the Master Rogue assumes his brother's place. Later, Prentice, delighted that the man whom he thinks is Frank can see, hands Armstrong a check for $20,000.

Albert returns with the Prentices, while Frank is held captive in the gang's rendezvous. The Master Rogue steals from the Prentice home and returns to the den. Determined that Frank shall not suffer, Buddy informs the police.

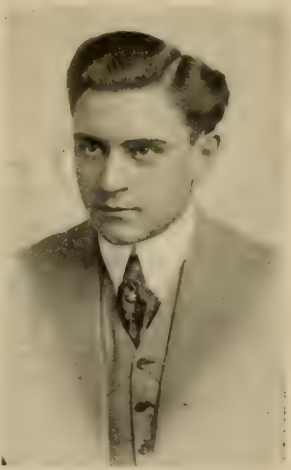
The police and revenue officials arrive and storm the place. Furious, Albert plans to blow up the building and thus kill his pursuers and Frank. The latter is rescued in the nick of time, however, while a falling packing case pins Albert. A terrific explosion follows. Albert meets his doom.

The rest of the gang are either killed or captured. The Prentices learn how they have been victimized. Frank is brought back to their home. Placing her arms about him, Louise promises to guide him through life.

Next to Mr. Melford, the acting of William H. West stood out as a fine artistic effort. Mr. West always improves even the least opportunities and often his work is almost creative. Settings and photography are up to the best Kalem standard.

NOLEN GANE.

NOLEN GANE, one of the most talented juvenile leading men among American photoplayers, has joined the Thanhouser forces at New Rochelle, N. Y., where he will be featured in many forthcoming productions released by that company. Gane created quite a sensation in theatrical circles a few years ago by playing the part of a real star when but thirteen years old. This was in the well-known and highly successful play, entitled, "From Rags to Riches." Young Gane's work in that production established his reputation permanently as a juvenile lead of exceptional merit.



Nolen Gane.

Following his engagement with the "Rags to Riches" company, Mr. Gane joined Orloff, the Russian actor. Orloff had witnessed Gane's work and made him an immediate offer which was accepted, as Gane was desirous of associating himself with so famous an actor as Orloff. Here he had exceptional opportunities to advance himself in the art of the theater and he made such good use of the opportunity that when the original company for "The Great Divide" was formed Gane was one of the first to be engaged. The first Thanhouser production in which Mr. Gane will appear is entitled Cardinal Richelieu's Ward," in which he plays the part of Francois, a part requiring an exceptionally deft touch. In rehearsal he has met the approval of the producing directors of the company, who are delighted with his rendition. Gane was also starred in the melodrama, "Billy the Kid" and appeared as Raymond in "Madame X." He has a fine stage presence and is certain to become a favorite with patrons of the photoplay.

NICHOLAS POWER RETURNS FROM ABROAD.

Nicholas Power arrived in New York on the steamship Rotterdam on Tuesday, April 14, from a two months' trip abroad. Mr. Power visited not only the British Isles and the continent, but extended his trip into Turkey and Egypt. The well-known manufacturer said that his sojourn had materially benefited him in health, and he looked it. He was met at the pier by a committee of his associates, which included General Manager J. F. Skerrett, Edward Earle, W. C. Smith, Arthur J. Lang and William Barry. The Animated Weekly was on the job and secured some excellent views of the returned traveler.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

STARTING SOMETHING IN IOWAY.

Progressive Program Mapped Out for the Semi-Annual State League Convention at Des Moines.

ANNOUNCING the semi-annual meeting of the Iowa State branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, which is to be held at the Kirkwood Hotel, Des Moines, Iowa, May 19 and 20, Secretary W. C. Eddy tells of some of the matters that are to come before the convention that should interest exhibitors in every Sate. It is proposed to create a "press committee," which will have representation in every city where are located newspapers of wide circulation. The duties of the committee will be to secure the publication of articles calculated to make known to the public the actual condition of the picture business and thus discourage the building of too many picture theaters; to fight censorship propaganda and to create sentiment in favor of a State-wide Sunday law. The committee will also work to prevent price cutting wars between exhibitors and to get exhibitors together in a plan that will create more business and a better feeling.

It is also proposed to form a "legislative committee" along the same lines which will work with the press committee in keeping track of legislation proposed at the State Capitol, reporting everything to the press that will be of interest to the exhibitor.

Secretary Eddy suggests that this plan might be properly called "The Iowa Plan" and believes that if it were to be adopted all over the country by State branches of the league, it would be the means of bringing the members more closely together and make the organization worth something to its members. In conclusion, Secretary Eddy writes:

"After the organization is perfected along permanent lines with permanent work established, local problems of admission, etc., can be very easily handled. We are working towards this end in Iowa, and this meeting will probably be the most important one in our history measured by progression. We in Iowa would be glad to learn of any other State taking up this line of organization, as the "Press Committees" can exchange ideas and material to good advantage.

"There is no doubt that the Exchanges would be glad to co-operate in the "Press Work," and we have already suggested this to one of our national officers, who will no doubt reach them when the time comes for a national campaign."

The Kirkwood Hotel, where the convention is to be held, furnishes an assembly room and committee rooms without charge. There will be no trade exhibition room, but the exhibitors will be glad to have the trade representatives make the Kirkwood their headquarters. Arrangements can be made with Thomas Veitch, manager.

MEETING TO DISCUSS CONVENTION.

A special meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York will be held at the Imperial Hotel on Wednesday, April 22, to discuss arrangements for a convention of exhibitors at Grand Central Palace, to be held during the exposition week of June 8 to 13. At this meeting committees will be appointed for arrangements, entertainment, transportation, etc. The meeting will be held at 11 o'clock sharp.

WISCONSIN CONVENTION.

State League Holds Enthusiastic Meeting at Green Bay—Elects Delegates to Dayton.

MORE than forty exhibitors, from every section of Wisconsin, and a large number of exchange men were in attendance at the state convention held at the Hotel Beaumont, Green Bay, April 7th and 8th. Not only was the business of the state league well taken care of during the meeting, but the exchange men, too, transacted an unusually large amount of business, especially in connection with late features.

On Tuesday, the first day of the convention, an open meeting was held, attended by both the exhibitors and exchange men. Through the courtesy of Syl. Duqueine, proprietor of the New Bijou Theater, arrangements were made, during the meeting, for a public showing the next day of some of the late multiple-reel pictures.

A closed meeting was held Wednesday morning when all private business matters were taken care of and delegates to the national convention at Dayton, Ohio, in July, were elected as follows: A. H. Grey, Oshkosh; W. E. McCanne, Appleton; H. H. Burford, LaCrosse; Henry Goldman, Green Bay; John R. Ek, national vice-president, Oshkosh.

The time and place of the next state convention was left for decision to the executive committee.

The pictures shown during the convention included: "The Gangsters of New York," Reliance; "Zingo and the White Elephant," Warner's; "Mysteries of Paris," Eclectic; and the one-reel Keystone comedy, "Mack At It Again." The exhibitors were well pleased with the showing and many bookings were secured by the various exchange men, among whom were the following: I. A. DeSomers, Western Film Exchange, Milwaukee; Phil Soloman, Warner's Features, Chicago; Walter A. Baier, Pan-American Film Company, Milwaukee branch; Carl Harthill, Union Film Company, Chicago; Paul H. Bush, Eclectic Film Company, Chicago; H. A. Wolfgram, World Film Corporation, Minneapolis; W. C. Brimmer, Universal Film Exchange, Milwaukee; O. H. Jacobs, Theater Supply Man of Milwaukee, and H. R. Hedden, Wolverine Feature Film Company, Milwaukee.

It is needless to say that the convention was a huge success in every way. The visiting exhibitors expressed themselves as having had a great time socially and otherwise.

FLORIDA CONVENTION.

State Exhibitors' League Meets at Sanford for an Interesting Session—Next Meeting at West Palm Beach.

THE second semi-annual convention, Florida State Branch No. 33, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, was held at Sanford, Fla., April 5, 6 and 7. Nearly all exhibitors who have joined the league in Florida were present. While this meeting was mostly to enlarge the membership, many things of interest to the exhibitors were discussed. Several new members came into the league, and the prospects of the next meeting, which will be held at West Palm Beach, look very favorable and no doubt the enrollment of members at that time will number over one hundred.

President Griffith tendered his resignation to the league, but it was not accepted and was laid by until the next meeting, when the regular election of officers takes place.

A wire was received from National President Neff, reading: "Best wishes to every member. May success attend your convention." Letters were also received from other members who were unable to attend.

Louis Kalbfield, of Palatke; Alfred Tano, of Kissimmee; A. H. LaBelle, of Tampa; Carl Kettler, "The Moving Picture Man" of West Palm Beach, and L. P. Davis, of Arcadia, were elected delegates to the national convention at Dayton, Ohio.

Great enthusiasm was shown by the members of the league and an organizer will be put in the field to secure an increase in membership. The entertainment and welcome extended by the Elks of Sanford was greatly appreciated by the exhibitors, as they placed their club rooms at the disposal of the exhibitors during their sojourn there.

Joseph Klein, from the Atlanta office of Warner's Features, was the only representative of the film companies present. He co-operated with the exhibitors and was one of the "live wires" who helped to make the convention a success.

Brother Kettler, of West Palm Beach, extended an invitation from the West Palm Beach City Council to hold the next convention there. Several of the plans he has outlined for the exhibitors promise to make the next the most successful and entertaining of any convention the Florida league has ever held.

After the meeting adjourned, the exhibitors in a body attended "The Last Ghost Dance," in three reels, exhibited by Mr. Klein of Warner's Features, at the Star Theater, which was enjoyed by all. The following day the exhibitors took an auto ride to Orlando, and from there to Kissimmee, as guests of Mr. Tano, of the Dixie Theater, Kissimmee, thus making a pleasant ending to the second semi-annual convention of the Florida State League.

NEW LINE UP IN PITTSBURGH.

Film Men of All Branches Form New Association and Elect Officers.

THE newly organized association of motion picture exhibitors, exchange men and others interested in the moving picture business which has adopted the name of the Moving Picture Protective Association, has held several successful meetings recently. The new organization was formed after statements and accusations were made that the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania, which was composed solely of exhibitors, was giving preference to certain film manufacturers. By founding an organization for the purpose of admitting to membership not only the exhibitors, but exchange men as well, it is hoped to further advance of the standing of the local business and to eliminate any possible cause of dissension.

The officers of the new organization are: President, Lawrence W. Rittenhouse; vice-president, W. E. White; secretary, A. J. Hanna, and treasurer, M. A. Ratt.

One of the first subjects taken up by the organization was that of insurance rates, which members declare to be excessive. A committee of six conferred with the Pittsburgh Board of Underwriters for the purpose of securing adjustments that would relieve the burden of high rates. This committee will also meet with Samuel A. Dies, superintendent of the bureau of building inspection, to confer on local building regulations for motion picture theaters.

Attorney Joseph Thompson has been retained by the association and he will lead in the fight against state censorship of films.

At the meeting of the association held last Sunday afternoon in the Columbia Theater, Fifth Avenue, the new building code was discussed. Protests against almost every section of the code in its relation to motion picture theaters were made and it was voted that the code commission be asked to make changes.

The representative of the motion picture interests on the code commission was introduced for the purpose of requesting the commission to make the changes before the code is presented to the department of labor and industry. The motion picture men say that some provisions of the code are vague and misleading and they wish to have their duties fully and explicitly explained. Other changes that are demanded by the members of the association are those in relation to requirements for seating and aisle space.

William Delves, who went to Philadelphia last week to consult Eastern motion picture men on the formation of a state association, reported that the Eastern men favored the appointment of a joint committee from the Eastern and Western organizations to draft a constitution and by-laws for the proposed association.

The committee of six was instructed to appoint two of its members to meet with two representatives of the Philadelphia organization in Harrisburg prior to the next meeting of the code commission in that city.

MANLEY.

PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITORS TO RAISE PRICES.

At the last regular Friday afternoon meeting of the Philadelphia Local of the M. P. E. L., the most important business transacted was the decision of the league members to raise the price of admission on Saturdays to ten cents. It is the intention of the members to put this ruling into immediate effect.

Those who can see into the future realize that this is the first real step which has been undertaken toward the higher admission price for every day in the week. Many of the houses which are now charging the increased price of admission started by increasing the price for one day only. Later this was changed to two days and thus gradually the full week was established.

MASSACHUSETTS LEGISLATURE FAVORS FEDERAL CENSORSHIP.

The report of the Senate Committee on Mercantile Affairs of the Massachusetts Legislature, asking "leave to withdraw" the proposed bill on State censorship was considered last week in that body. On motion of Mr. Cox the report was amended by substituting a resolution favoring the bill pending in the Congress of the United States relative to the establishment of a moving picture commission. Pending the amendment and pending the main question accepting the report, further consideration of the matter was postponed until the next session. This is said to be the end of the censorship question in Massachusetts for this year.

NEW YORK LEAGUE CONVENTION.

Arrangements Complete for Big Meeting and Ball at Rochester, May 5.

PLANS for the fourth annual convention of New York State Branch, No. 11, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to be held at the Hotel Seneca, Rochester, Tuesday, May 5th, are under way and a large number of delegates will be present. Among those who have accepted invitations to attend are M. A. Neff, national president, of Cincinnati, Ohio; George H. Wiley, of Kansas City, Mo., national secretary, and National Vice-President F. C. Pierce, of Geneva, N. Y.

Mayor H. H. Edgerton has been invited to address the delegates at an open meeting to be held in the ballroom of the Seneca at 10:30 a.m. It is likely that current affairs in the motion picture world will be discussed at this meeting. At 2 p.m. the convention will go into executive session and reports will be received.

The chief purpose of the convention is to elect delegates to the national convention, to be held at Dayton, Ohio, the week of July 6th. This convention will probably be the largest affair in the history of the national organization.

A grand ball, to be held in convention hall, will wind up the State convention. Word has been received from New York City that four of the well-known actors and actresses of the motion picture world will be in Rochester to attend this ball and arrangements are under way for a number of informal receptions to be held by them at some of the local theaters.

THEATER STANDARD FOR PENNSYLVANIA.

Commissioner Jackson Preparing New Rules and Regulations to Have State-Wide Application—Exhibitors Invited to Confer.

THE Pennsylvania Department of Labor and Industry through its Commissioner, Mr. John Price Jackson, is drawing up a new set of standards for picture theaters which may be hereafter erected or remodeled. These regulations will apply to all cities and towns irrespective of size. The new standards follow in many respects the laws of 1911, which govern the buildings for motion picture theaters in cities of the first class, which means only Philadelphia. It is intended to submit the new regulations to the next Legislature and to have them incorporated into a law. The Commissioner has very fairly invited members of the Exhibitors League of Philadelphia and of Pittsburgh as well as prominent engineers and architects to be members of a committee to draft the regulations in connection with his department.

For the information of Pennsylvania exhibitors The Moving Picture World prints herewith the full text of the proposed code as prepared by Commissioner Jackson:

1.—(a)—All buildings hereafter erected or remodeled for the exhibition of motion pictures, must be of approved fire proof construction, and the main auditorium of such motion picture theater shall not be above or below the ground floor. Nor shall any new motion picture theater be permitted in a building situated on a lot less than 25 feet in width.

2.—(a)—There shall be at least one lateral aisle of a uniform width of not less than 4 feet in the clear, leading to exits, and on either side of such aisle there shall be not more than seven seats. NEW YORK LOCAL NO. 1 PERMANENTLY ORGANIZED.

Enthusiastic Meeting of Exhibitors at Hunt's Point Palace Tuesday Night Establishes League in Greater New York.

ONCE more the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America has proper representation in Greater New York. Since the members of the old New York association bolted from the League at the National convention last July, it has been difficult for the parent organization to get a foothold in the greater city. Several attempts have been made and have failed until the matter was finally taken up by President John J. Wittman of the Cinema Club of the Bronx and his associates. The Cinema Club was organized in the Bronx about a year ago and steadily maintained its independence of all outside influences. It built up a strong organization among the exhibitors of the Bronx and has been of great material assistance to its members.

Believing, however, that the prestige of the club would be increased by affiliating with the National League the members decided a few weeks ago to reorganize New York Local No. 1. Arrangements looking toward that end were made upon the occasion of the latest visit to New York of National President M. A. Neff and the process of organization has since been going on until last Tuesday evening, April 14, when a permanent organization was effected by the adoption of bylaws and the election of officers.

The meeting in question was held at Hunt's Point Palace, in the Bronx, President Wittman presiding. After the regular business of the Cinema Club had been transacted a meeting of the temporary organization of Local No. 1 was called. Louis S. Harris of the committee appointed to draft a constitution and bylaws read the report of that committee which constituted the rules for the new organization. They were adopted unanimously and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President, John J. Wittman; first vice-president, R. L. MacNabb; second vice-president, Louis S. Harris; secretary, M. L. Fleischman; treasurer, John J. Mullaney; sergeant-at-arms, J. L. Deegan.

The constitution provides for the organization of branches in each borough of Greater New York. The Cinema Club will be known as Branch A; other branches will be designated in the order formed. When every borough is organized a central body will be formed to transact the business of the Local, but all branches will maintain separate organizations to meet local conditions.

After the meeting the members present partook of a light lunch provided by the Cinema Club.

NEBRASKA CONVENTION CALLED.

Secretary E. C. Preston, of the Nebraska State Exhibitors' League, has issued a call for the annual convention of that organization which is to take place at Grand Island, Neb., on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 2 and 3. It is expected that President Neff of the National League will be present and that the meeting will be one of the biggest ever held in that State. A meeting of the State Board of Directors will be held on April 27 and 28 to complete arrangements for the meeting. Members who have suggestions to make concerning the convention are invited to be present at that time or to write to Secretary Preston, Superior, Neb., or to P. L. McCarthy, vice-president, Grand Island. Any information regarding the league or the convention can be obtained from the officers mentioned.

NATIONAL SECRETARY WILEY IS OPTIMISTIC.

George H. Wiley, National Secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, has returned to Dayton, Ohio, and writes to the Moving Picture World regarding the outlook for the Fourth Annual League convention and Second International Exposition to be held at Dayton, in an enthusiastic vein.

"I am more than pleased with the outlook," he writes. "Within the next thirty days we will not have an inch of space left on the ground floor. We have secured contracts from some of the best people in the business and the exhibits will be of a great variety," he continued, "and I believe that the attendance at the convention will be a record breaker."

NEW YORK EXPOSITION.

Committees Working Hard to Sell Space at Grand Central Palace—Elaborate Decorations Planned.

COMMITTEES of solicitors are as busy as bees selling space for the New York Motion Picture Exposition to be held at Grand Central Palace under the auspices of the New York Exhibitors' Association during the week of June 8 to 13. A visit to the exposition offices by a representative of the Moving Picture World found everybody busy and optimistic. Indications are that by the time the doors open to the public all available space will be taken and that the enterprise will prove successful and profitable to the promoters.

It is proposed to convert the exposition hall into a veritable bower of beauty. Sketches of the decorative plan show very beautiful effects. A large appropriation has been made to cover the expense of this work.

The following representative firms of the allied trades are reported to have secured space:

The Famous Players, Vitagraph Company, Shubert Feature Film Co., Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co., The World Film Corporation, Cameron Projecting Machine, Warner's Features, The New York Edison Co., The United Electric Light and Power Co., Ernemann Photo-Kino Co., The Nicholas Power Company, The Precision Machine Company, The Gaumont Company, H. W. Johns-Manville Company, Wyanoak Publishing Company, The Dramatic Mirror, Motion Picture Apparatus Company, United States Printing & Lithographing Co., Motion Picture Magazine, Picture Theater Equipment Company, Stereo Advertising Company, Koerting & Mathiesen, The Morning Telegraph, Bland Adjustable Display Frame Co., World Film Corporation, The Novelty Slide Company, H. C. Miner Lithograph Company, The Pathescope Company, Dragon Feature Film Co., The G. H. Masten Decorating Co.

IRVING CUMMINGS

Popular Photoplayer, Who Is Now a Member of the Thanhouser Stock Company.

IRVING CUMMINGS, one of the most popular leading men of the screen today, will soon be seen again in Mutual pictures. Mr. Cummings, who has a personal following among the photo-play "fans" of the country which is second to none, is now under a long-term contract with the Thanhouser Film Corporation. He is now hard at work at the New Rochelle studio.

Irving Cummings.

"I feel great pleasure in knowing that I am to be seen again in Mutual pictures," said Mr. Cummings, after he had signed the contract. "I feel that my present reputation is due a great deal to the many Reliance features in which I was starred and I know that the greater part of my personal following is made up of Mutual patrons.

"When I left the Mutual last year I felt ill at ease over the change and I have not been contented ever since then. My restlessness, I fear, has been conspicuous. Now a chance has come for me to return to the people with whom I prefer to associate and I am very glad to have taken it."

Mr. Cummings, as a leading man, possesses many unique qualifications. He has good looks and histrionic ability. In addition he has a wonderful personal following among the "fans" and has attained as much favorable publicity during the past year as has any other motion picture actor. He has been constantly before the public through being featured in big pictures and through personally appearing in motion picture theaters.

Mr. Cummings has had an interesting career. Before becoming a favorite of the screen he spent twelve busy years on the speaking stage—years valuable for the training they gave him. His fierst appearance was in "Edwin Arden's" stock company, in Washington, D. C.

Mr. Cummings made his screen debut with the Powers Motion Picture Company, playing leads. A year with Pathe Freres followed and then came his appearance in the Reliance Company. Here Mr. Cummings played the leads in many features under the direction of Oscar Apfel and attained his present enviable reputation. Among his best-known pictures were "The Man From Outside," "Italian Love," "Ashes" and "Success." After a long stay with Reliance, Mr. Cummings became connected with Pathe Freres and played the leads in the Pathe features. From this he now comes to Thanhouser pictures and will be seen in important leading roles.

Notwithstanding his long record as a successful leading man, Mr. Cummings is on the sunny side of thirty and appears younger. He is an athlete in ability and captained the Reliance baseball team through a successful season. Although usually cast for leading roles he is fond of playing characters, especially the Italian.

CHARLIE DE FORREST JOINS CRYSTAL.

CHARLIE DE FORREST, the inimitable and exceedingly clever comedian, who has lately joined the Crystal Film Company, and who is being featured by them, has well earned the sobriquet of "The Napoleon of Comedy," by which name he is now known from Maine to California. Mr. De Forrest, before his debut in pictures, quite a few years ago, was a member of the famous American Four, the vaudeville act that was a fixture at Tony Pastor's old music hall. It is claimed Mr. De Forrest is without a peer in his line and is one of the most versatile as well as one of the most daring comedians now appearing in films. There is no part or character too difficult or feat requiring real courage that Mr. De Forrest has not done in his many years on the screen.

Charlie De Forrest.

Mr. De Forrest, at present, is deeply engrossed in his work at the Crystal Studio, and it is whispered that some of the comedies just finished are more than worth while. Mr. De Forrest has his diversion, but outside of being funny the Napoleon of Comedy says his favorite hobby now is pay day, and we would not doubt it for an instant after looking at the size of his weekly stipend. Mr. De Forrest is one of the high-priced comedians, and the Crystal Company is to be congratulated on the securing of his services.

TO OPEN HIGH-CLASS PICTURE HOUSE.

Another evidence that the new era of motion picture exhibition in Los Angeles, Cal., has arrived, will be found in the New Columbia Theater to be erected for the Columbia Theater Circuit that has been formed to control new houses on Main, Broadway, Hill and other principal streets of that city and on the Pacific Coast. As many as twenty-five theaters are in contemplation by the company. The plot of ground to be covered by the Columbia Theater is 125 x 165 feet. It will have a seating capacity of one thousand. The investment involves $150,000, and includes the value of the land. The ventilation system will be so constructed to change the air in the auditorium every minute. The accoustic properties will be perfect and the line of vision absolutely clear. The general color scheme to be employed will be old rose, old ivory and Moorish tints with gold. Extending over the sidewalk will be an artistic glass canopy beautifully illuminated with electric lights. The indirect lighting system is to be used throughout. The structure is to be strictly sanitary in every way. A fireproof operating room will contain two machines, stereopticon, spot light, etc. An innovation will be ten semi-circular loges in the center of the theater, each of which is to accommodate five persons. The women's and men's parlors will be commodious and completely furnished. The screen will be 18 x 20 feet. A large pipe organ, with a Vox-Humana attachment, will be installed.

Doings at Los Angeles.

TOM FORTUNE, who is technical director at the Lasky Studio, in Hollywood, while speeding from Los Angeles last week with a complete outfit of burglar tools was chased by a speed cop. In his effort to get away he went past the limit and was caught. The cycle officer pulled him into the police court where the tools were discovered and the detectives thought they had a real crook. They emptied the three grips and found drills, powder, electric steel burners, jimmys, and every imaginable safe cracking implement. He had a hard time convincing the judge that he was taking the outfit to the studio to be used in a vault scene in "The Master Mind." He was fined and allowed to go back. The company lost a half day's work.

George C. Stanley, who left the Vitagraph last week, has been given a Universal Powers' company, of which Edna Maison will be the featured star. George Larkin will play opposite her. Clarence Burton will also be in the company, the other members not having been selected. Harry Haskin, who so successfully directed the Mission Play on the real stage, will be the assistant director.

* * *

David M. Hartford, directing for Zodiac, has gone across the channel to famous Catalina Island for a ten-days' picture taking expedition. He has a full company and extras making forty people. They will work mountain-sea pictures for a real sea story.

* * *

Director Joseph Maddern, formerly of Essanay, but who has been with Keystone for two weeks, is finishing a great one-reel educational film which shows the evolution of a newspaper. High-powered electric arcs were used in the Los Angeles Times building, to make light for the film.

The Albuquerque Company here does not buy scenarios. All scripts are written by the leading lady, Dot Farley, and Mrs. Fahrney, wife of Director Milton H. Fahrney. The company has just finished a three-reel Western which will be ready for release in a short time.

April Fool's Day was not such a fool's day for H. Pathe Lehrman, director for the Sterling studio. His borthday same on the first and Ford Sterling and Fred J. Balshofer presented the lucky man with a handsome gold watch. The entire company was assembled on the stage at the Hollywood studio and witnessed the presentation.

Hugh Ford, on of the state's best-known stage directors, has arrived at the Famous Players' headquarters and is working with Edwin S. Porter, who is directing Mary Pickford. Carlyle Blackwell, who recently left Kalem, will join this company, opening next week. He is to give a grand reception to fellow fotoplayers Saturday evening.

William D. Taylor, leading man, who left Vitagraph last week, was the eloquent toastmaster at the Wednesday night fellowship dinner of the club. He told how the actors should bear in mind "fellowship" when at the club, and not to pair off and create cliques. His talk was heartily received.

* * *

Harrington Reynolds, late of Lubin, and who has been with the Broncho camp, leaves next week for Australia, to produce The Rosary," and to star in his original part of Father Kelly. In addition he will promote a film company, to be known as the Australia Bush Film Company, which will penetrate into the fastness of the inlands for the purpose of getting first taken pictures of the Australian aborigines.

So great has been the demand for the new series of ten handsome character poses of Ford Sterling that the company has ordered another thousand of the 8 x 10 posters, which are now ready for mailing. These are for lobby display.

The latest for baseball fans is a Pacific Coast movie league, composed of teams from the various film companies operating in and around this city. The B. H. Dyas Sporting Goods Company has put up a handsome silver loving cup to go to the winning team. Thursday evening the 2nd, a dance was given at Universal City, the proceeds to go toward fitting up the team of which Ford Sterling and Robert Leonard are the stars, having played big ball before going on the screen. The competing teams will be from the Universal, Vitagraph, American, Broncho, Biograph, Reliance, and a team from the Universal ranch will also play.

Edmund Breese, who played the star part in "The Master Mind," produced by Lasky, will soon leave with the precious film. It is the custom for each leading man to go to New York with his production. "The Virginian" was started this week.

Wallace Reid, who has been conducting his own company, has been sick for a week owing to a bad sprain which he received while riding a cayuse up at the American ranch. He rode a horse some time ago and sprained his back again, which made him unable to work of late. However, this week he is starting to do 101 Bison pictures in the absence of Henry McRae, who is in Honolulu at the present time with a large list of players.

Henry W. Otto, secretary and treasurer of the Photoplayers' Club, has a secret, but he let slip the information that a change was at hand for the club quarters. The building is to be sold and remodeled. This will allow more room for the rapidly growing organization. The club still is on the rise and is surely outgrowing the present large and elegant quarters.

* * *

Director David W. Griffith has just completed "Home, Sweet, Home," a tremendous production which took the entire Reliance crew. He was visited by Col. Griffith, the multi-millionaire, who gave the city the beautiful park bearing his name, which has been used for many scenes by nearly every company here. The colonel expressed his satisfaction with the Mutual studios and took great interest in seeing the films exposed.

Charles Giblyn, who was one of the best Broncho and Kay-Bee producers, has joined the Sterling studio and will soon be directing comedies.

Harry Harvey, who so well directed a full company for the Balboa Company, has migrated with his players to the Universal rendezvous in Hollywood, where he will start next week on Edgar Allen Poe's "Goldbug," which will be done in three reels. Belle Bennett and Howard Livingston will play opposite leads, while Howard Davies will portray heavies. Rena Kuhn is the ingenue and Marion Roth will play characters. After the first film is done this new company will do other big pictures of three reels and over.

* * *

Three teams of baseball players have been organized at the Mutual studios, and are now practicing for the initial game of the season, which will soon be pulled off at Hollywood. The players will receive their nifty uniforms in a week or ten days. They are blue with "Mutual Players" on the front of the blouses and the big Mutual Movie clock on the backs.

What might have been caused the Francis Ford Company of Universal players to turn their heads and hide their faces with dread when Miss Essie Fay, who is the only one who goes into the lion's den at the ranch, was caught in the trap-door as one of the lionesses made a spring for her. The cameramen who were outside the cage threw rocks at the old lion, but missed a shot and hit a lioness, who instantly became enraged and jumped for the girl. She sprang to the door and as it closed the body of the animal hit it and hastened its closing, smashing her hand in the crack and badly bruising it. She tugged it out, only after the huge paw of the beast had barely scraped it.

CLARKE IRVINE.

PURELY PERSONAL.

W. H. Bell, one-time manager of George K. Spoor's exchanges, afterward manager for J. D. Williams in Australia, has just returned from a four months' sojourn in Europe where he visited the several motion picture centers. Mr. Bell made a thorough study of foreign conditions both as to production and market, and may have something to communicate to American picture makers and dealers before long.

Samuel Long, of the Kalem Company, is out again after a long and serious illness.

John Rock, Chicago representative of the Vitagraph Company, came on to New York to help open the Strand. It is said that John has been commissioned to make a trip of inspection to the several branches of the General Film Company.

Agnes Egan Cobb has returned from a very successful trip through the far west for Features Ideal and Leading Players, and is again busy at her desk in the offices of the Eclair Company, 130 West 46th Street, New York.

"Chicot, the Jester."

The Leading Players Produce a Three-Reel Adaptation of the Story of Alexandre Dumas.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Leading Players are showing a finely staged three-part adaptation of Alexandre Dumas' "Chicot the Jester." It is filled with the pomp and pageantry of the sixteenth century. The costumes are elaborate. The action is enlivened by a number of stirring incidents, prominent among which are two fights in which Count De Bussy, the hero of the story, holds off with his sword unbelievable numbers of his enemies. So also are there two processions in which many men and women are employed. One of these, a religious festival, is of unusual magnitude and goes far to sustain the courtly atmosphere that pervades the picture.

Chicot, played by Mr. Perny, is the jester at the court of Henri III, a friend of De Bussy, a courtier. When the king gives Chicot an order of arrest for De Bussy the jester destroys the document in front of the man he is sent for. De Bussy is later waylaid by the king's men, but after a stiff fight he is able to enter the home of Diana, his sweetheart, who secretly nurses him back to health. The Count de Monsoreau kidnaps Diana and marries her. Chicot, although a stanch partisan of the king, has been unable to prevent De Bussy losing Diana. The jester is satisfied that Monsoreau is planning treachery to the Crown and sets about gathering evidence. De Bussy meantime is seeking Diana in the absence of Monsoreau at a religious festival. The Count returns unexpectedly, and with his men fall upon De Bussy, who is only saved by the exceedingly timely arrival of Chicot with a number of the king's men and an order for the arrest of Monsoreau. Chicot does not serve the document, however. Instead, in a struggle he compels Monsoreau to stab himself with his own sword. The jester then finishes a good day's work by delivering the widow Monsoreau to her first and only lover, De Bussy.

The picture will make strong appeal to those who enjoy costume plays, well photographed backgrounds and interiors to harmonize with the period, and physical conflict.

"Dr. Goudron's System."

The Leading Players are also showing "Dr. Goudron's System," a two-reel subject adapted from the drama of Andre de Lorde. It is a powerful story and a horrible one, yet fascinating in spite of its horror. Exhibitors may be well advised if they read the synopsis before displaying the picture to their patrons. The writer will admit he liked it, although to be sure at the time he was in the blasé attitude that is the natural corollary of a viewing in the forenoon, the hour most remote from that at which graveyards and respectable human beings still out of bed are said to be most likely to yawn.

The story has to do with the mutiny of the inmates of an insane asylum. The keepers by a ruse are locked up. Only the director is free. The ringleaders of the maniacs are Dr. Goudron and Professor Plume. The director is overpowered. Brezard, a writer, by appointment comes to the asylum accompanied by his wife. Too late he discovers the situation. A lot of things happen before the writer and his wife are released. Mr. Gouget —it would seem quite apropos to pronounce it "gouge it"—and Mr. Bahier portray with uncanny realism the leaders of the maniacs. The picture is well made and well photographed. However, don't show it to your patrons without looking at it yourself, for "Dr. Goudron's System" is no food for infants or weaklings; and if you do show it put it at the beginning of your program.

K. W. LINN TO REPRESENT ECLECTIC ABROAD.

WHEN the steamship Imperator sailed from New York to London on April 15th it took away from the New York film coterie a man who, in the short space of fifteen months, has made an enviable name for himself and who in that time has established one of the largest feature film companies in America. We are referring to Mr. Kurt W. Linn, the founder of the Eclectic Film Company, of New York.

In that short space of time the Eclectic, under Mr. Linn's guidance, has set a pace that has been a hard one to follow. Beginning with the great "Les Miserables," the list of features emanating from the Eclectic establishment has been uniformly of the highest quality. Mr. Linn himself is the one who had the happy thought of naming the concern as it is. The word Eclectic means selecting that which is true and excellent of doctrines or opinions, and it need hardly be said that the Eclectic Film Company has lived up to its name in its choice of features. The slogan of the company has been "The cream of the European market selected for America," and this slogan has been lived up to.

K. W. Linn.

But now Mr. Linn has left us. He goes to London to make his headquarters there as European representative of the Eclectic Film Company. In that capacity he will cover all of Europe in the search for feature productions of the better kind. In this work he has the advantage of being an accomplished linguist, speaking English, German and French like a native. Besides this he knows the film situation on both sides of the Atlantic thoroughly and is, without doubt, one of the best equipped men that ever represented an American firm abroad. Mr. Linn is succeeded as manager of the Eclectic Film Company by Arthur Roussel.

$75,000 MOVING PICTURE AND VAUDEVILLE THEATER.

Articles of incorporation have been applied for by Lemotto Smith and Henry H. Bieberson, Jr., who intend to build an expensive and big moving picture and vaudeville house at 420 East Main Street, Alliance, Ohio. The company is to be incorporated at $100,000. The proposed theater will be 70 feet wide by 120 feet long. It will be built of structural steel and reinforced concrete, and the auditorium will have a seating capacity of 1,000.

MISS KELLERMANN AT THE GLOBE.

In "Neptune's Daughter," the Universal Seven-Reel Subject, She Will Be Seen on Broadway.

ON Monday, April 25, the Globe Theater will be added to the list of those transferred to the screen side of the industry. Under the direction of Universal Moving Pictures "Neptune's Daughter," the seven-reel subject in which Miss Annette Kellermann is starred, will be shown on that occasion. It was in the making of this picture that Miss Kellermann, accompanied by a large party of players under the direction of Herbert Brenon, went to Bermuda, where all of the exteriors were photographed. The World has already told of the serious accident which befell Mr. Brenon while he and Miss Kellermann were taking a scene in a tank which delayed their departure for home by a month. One of the novelties of this picture and one that will contribute a notable quality to the production is the photographing of Crystal Cave, a great vault 100 feet underground and approximately 200 by 150 in dimensions. There is a depth of 30 feet of water on the floor of this great room. Under the great pendent stalactites many of the mermaid scenes were enacted.

The story of "Neptune's Daughter" was written by Captain Leslie T. Peacocke, of the Universal staff, especially for Miss Kellermann, whose activities heretofore have been confined to vaudeville and musical productions. The scenario gives the marvelous swimmer abundant opportunity to show her skill in the water and also to demonstrate her ability as an actress. She is supported by competent screen artists, some of the Universal's best, including among them William E. Shay, Miss Leah Baird and William Welsh. Independent of the large company which went to Bermuda from New York there appear in the picture many British soldiers stationed in the island as well as troops of children.

"THE FLAMES OF JUSTICE" (Primagraph).

A five-part feature production is offered by the Primagraph Company under the title of "The Flames of Justice," taken from a well-known story of tragic character. The synopsis of this subject may be found on page 586 of this number of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. The leading part in this film drama is played by Miss Julia de Kelety, a Hungarian-American actress of some ability.

A NOVELTY ANNOUNCEMENT SLIDE.

The Vitaslide Company, whose advertisement appears on another page in this issue, offers a decided novelty in the way of an announcement slide. By an automatic device, a change is effected simulating motion. Otherwise the slide is the same as any other in construction. As a variation from the usual form of announcement slide the Vitaslide will be a welcome relief. Full particulars can be obtained from the company at 70 Turk Street, San Francisco, Cal.

SUN-VITAGRAPH CONTEST.

Reports from the scenario contest being conducted by the New York Sun in conjunction with the Vitagraph Company are to the effect that a large number of regular story writers are taking an active interest in the affair. Many scripts of real merit have been received and it is known that several of the very top-notch writers have sent in their contributions. The contest closes May 1st.

ANOTHER FEATURE COMPANY.

E. K. Lincoln Heads the Photo Play Productions Company and Will Appear in Big Subjects.

A NEW concern to enter the motion picture field is the Photo Play Productions Company, with executive offices on the tenth floor of the Candler Building, 220 West Forty-second Street, New York City, of the more recent film-producing companies one of the most auspiciously launched. The new company, which will have for its policy the production of feature pictures, made on a pretentious scale and with painstaking care, has associated with it several persons whose names augur well for its success.

E. K. Lincoln.

The leading man of the Photo Play Productions Company will be E. K. Lincoln, an actor who has been consistently featured by the Vitagraph Company of America during his two years with that concern. Mr. Lincoln plays a leading part in the five-part special production, "A Million Bid," featured at Vitagraph Theater, Broadway and Forty-fourth Street, New York City, and has played leads in many other important plural-reel Vitagraph features. Mr. Lincoln is rated as one of the most pleasing and most competent of screen actors, and has a large personal following among the photoplay devotees. William J. Sorelle will play opposite Mr. Lincoln. Mr. Sorelle was the first leading man ever engaged by the Edison Company, and has been a favorite player throughout the whole history of the motion picture industry.

The general manager of the Photo Play Productions Company is Frank A. Tichenor, the man who started the Manhattan Slide and Film Company and built it into prosperity. Through long experience in the motion picture industry, Mr. Tichenor is familiar with it from many angles.

Two other important positions are well filled. The producer is Edgar Lewis, who made Reliance pictures for the Mutual program for a long time. The photographer is Philip Rosen, one of the country's best-known cameramen. Mr. Rosen made a trip into South America for the Edison Company, with which he was connected for several years. He has also been with the Mutual Film Corporation and the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. He is rated as a photographic expert.

Another whose connection with the company will mean much as regards the producing end is Edward Peple, the dramatist. Mr. Peple is the author of "The Littlest Rebel," "The Prince Chap," "The Love Route," and "A Pair of Sixes," the latest hit on Broadway and the success of the current theatrical season.

JOSEPH F. LEE OPENS OFFICE.

Joseph F. Lee, representing the American Feature Film Company of Boston, has opened an office in Room 810, Longacre Building, New York City. The American is the distributor of Lasky features for New England, and its determination to establish an office in the metropolis was due to the desire to keep a sharp eye on the feature market in order the better to serve New England exhibitors. Mr. Lee is an old timer in the film business from the exhibiting side and has a wide acquaintance among theater men in Yankeeland. The quarters of the American Company in Boston are at 162 Tremont Street, where it has the entire fifth floor.

LADIES' WORLD HERO CONTEST.

There has been a change in the motion picture "hero contest" being conducted by The Ladies' World as regards the line-up of the contestants. For a long time J. Warren Kerrigan was in the lead, with Maurice Costello second, but the latest reports say that Francis X. Bushman, of Essanay, has taken a spurt and is away in the lead—a full hundred thousand votes to the good. During the past month votes have been coming into the office of The Ladies' World in vastly increasing numbers, indicating a growing interest in the pictures and the contest.

Among the Picture Theaters.

News and Views of Houses Here and There.

CRANDALL'S THEATER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

AMONG the up-to-the-minute moving picture houses of Washington, D. C., is Crandall's Theater, at Ninth and E streets, Northwest, where everything has been, and is being done to look after the comfort of the patrons. Among the conveniences is a ladies' retiring room where a maid is always in waiting and full opportunities offered there is a plentiful supply of individual face cloths and the management supplies a lot of good face powder daily. For the gentlemen there are uniformed colored men who are ready to lend aid in the removal of overcoats, and the water boys make the rounds at short intervals. There is also a check room; all employees of the theater are either in uniform or evening dress, and there is an air of aristocracy everywhere prevalent. Then, too, there is the music which is exceptionally good.

The seating capacity of the house is 550 and the class of shows being put on seems to guarantee a full house at all times. Feature films are being used to good advantage for the renovation of complexions, for at the dressing table and in the near future certain productions which will necessitate the increasing of the admission fee from ten cents, as now charged, to twenty-five cents, will be used. Mr. Crandall told the World representative that he fully believed there is an opportunity for the showing of the highest class of films and that the public would be willing to pay well for the privilege of viewing them. Practically all of the houses in the neighborhood are running five cent shows, but Crandall's seem to be doing a good business at ten cents. The projection of this theater is very good and the figures seem to stand out a little more prominently on the gold radium screen than is ordinarily the case.

The floor of the theater has been covered with a rubber mat, making the place easy of cleansing. The ventilation and heating systems are good and 125,000 cubic feet of air can be inducted into the house each minute, although the fans are so powerful there is no suction and absolutely no noise.

Throughout, the theater is elaborately decorated with paintings and frescoes. Artificial light is produced by four lights of the semi-direct type which make the theater light enough for one to read a newspaper without discomfort and yet the brilliancy of the projection is in no wise diminished. There are also a number of side lights set in ornamental shades. The ceiling is of white art metal and the walls are paneled and frescoed. There are four exits leading directly to the street, and these are approached by railed-in aisles which would tend to prevent panic and crushing in the event of a rush being made to leave the theater.

The employees of the theater are polite and on the jump, seating the patrons with a minimum loss of time, and noiselessly. As Mr. Crandall stated a money-getting house is one in which the patrons are at all times seated, for those who are forced to stand up during a part of the show more often hold the seats later on to see the entire show over again. Mr. Guy Barrett is manager. The Crandall Corporation, which owns the theater, has as its president, H. M. Crandall, well known in the local moving picture circles.

Bell Airdome, Austin, Texas

THE season for airdomes is approaching rapidly. Exhibitors who were running airdomes last summer instead of closed theaters are now beginning to get them in readiness for the coming open-air entertainment season, and many alfresco amusement places are being planned. As a means of being instrumental in giving those whose plans are yet in the tentative stage a concrete idea of a beautiful entrance to an open-air theater, we publish the accompanying night photo of the Bell Airdome, Austin, Texas. It is one of the best airdome fronts we have ever seen, and it is even better than many entrances to closed picture houses. The front of this open-air theater shows that care has been given to its plans, with the result that it is attention-compelling in its simple lines of architecture. The decorations are conservative and the hundreds of electric uights have been tastily arranged. The pillars add to its beauty, and in our judgment this amusement place can be called "the airdome beautiful."

Bell Airdome, Austin, Texas.

Its location is at the corner of West Ninth and Colorado streets. It is in the heart of the city and is only a short distance from the City Hall. Its dimensions are 128 by 138 feet, and it has a seating capacity of 2,200. The floor is of cement with a good incline to it so than an unobstructed view of the picture is to be had from any angle of the seating plan. The projection surface consists of a Gold Fibre Radium screen, 17 by 21 feet in size. The Bell Airdome Company, owners of the place, say that it has been equipped with one of the biggest stages of any outdoor theater in the South. It projects the largest picture that has ever been shown in Texas, according to the Bell Company, and there are three Power's machines of the latest type in the projection room. All modern conveniences have been installed for the patrons. There is also a large refreshment booth where ice cream and soft drinks of all kinds are served. Music is furnished by orchestral pianos, with a big band twice each week.

REGENT THEATER, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

It is reported that the first theater in Philadelphia to charge ten cents for a moving picture entertainment consisting of feature films is the Regent Theater, 1632-34 Market Street. The house also claims the distinction of being the first theater in Market Street, west of the City Hall to the Schuylkill River. The theater is under the direction of Alexander R. Boyd. F. W. Buhler is the manager. Also under Mr. Boyd's direction come the Bijou Dream Theater, 1205 Market Street, Philadelphia, and the Family Theater, Newark, N. J.

Regent Theater, Philadelphia, Pa.

One of the features of the Regent is the mammoth pipe organ with the "human voice." At times a duet is rendered by skilled musical artists, one playing the organ and the other the piano.

Mr. Boyd, with Mr. Buhler, is trying hard to establish a new era in the picture situation in Philadelphia, and, according to reports, progress is being made in that direction.

BIJOU THEATER, ALTOONA, PA.

The Bijou Theater, Stehle Block, Altoona, Pa., has recently undergone complete remodeling, which brings the house in the forefront of small picture houses as an example of sanitation and comfort. Notwithstanding that the interior is plain, it is artistic.

Frank Stehle, the manager and proprietor, has kept severely away from gaudy colors and has reverted to the old English style, simple yet attractive. The auditorium can comfortably seat 350 persons, and the space between the rows is quite enough to allow of easy ingress and egress. A thirty-inch exhaust fan changes the air every few minutes, and the interior is never in darkness. One can read a newspaper in any part of the house while the picture is being shown. The side wall lights are supported by pilasters, and all wiring is done in conduits. There are two Power's No. 6-A machines in the fireproof operating-room. The size of the picture projected is 12 by 16 feet.

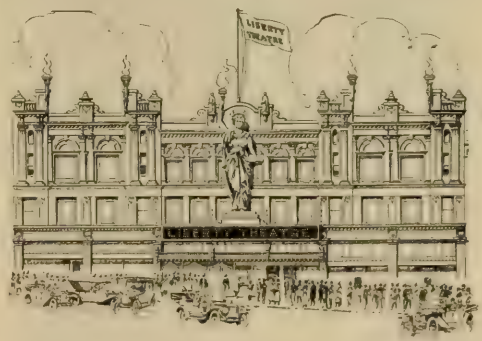
The exterior is lighted with sixteen pendant lamps enclosed in art glass, casting a soft glow. The entrance doors and the ticket booth also contain art glass which relieves the monotony of the oak and white finishing of the lobby. As can be observed from the accompanying illustration of the front of the Bijou, Mr. Stehle has also exercised good judgment in the displaying of the posters. If the reader will look closely enough at the picture he will see that they are placed neatly on the side walls of the lobby, and on each side of the entrance proper.

LIBERTY THEATER, SEATTLE, WASH.

The accompanying illustration is a line drawing of the big moving picture theater C. S. Jensen and J. Von Herberg, owners of the Alhambra, Seattle, Wash., are building in that city. It is being erected on the east side of First Avenue, just north of Pike Street. The cost of construction will run up to about $125,000, and with the furnishings, which will be approximately $75,000, the owners will have expended around $200,000.

The frontage on First Avenue will be three stories in height. The auditorium will have a seating capacity of 2,600, which will be divided between the orchestra floor and the balcony. There will be no posts to obstruct a clear view of the picture from any angle of the house, and the balcony will not be reached by stairways or elevators but by broad inclines. There will be no lower boxes, but a circle of loges at the front of the balcony. An idea of the completeness which will characterize the Liberty may be gleaned from the fact that the Hope-Jones unit orchestrion to be installed will cost $35,000.

The latest of heating and ventilating systems will be installed. A twelve-foot fan will force the air through water in order that it may be purified. In winter the air will pass over steam coils; in summer over ice. The indirect lighting system will prevail.



Architect's Drawing of Liberty Theater, Seattle, Wash.

The lighting of the exterior of the theater which will be of white glazed terra cotta will be a wonderful feature. The Statue of Liberty over the First Avenue sidewalk will bear aloft a glass torch containing 1,200 electric globes. There will be four other torches in the roof, each containing 475 incandescent lights. In addition to these torches there will be six smaller ones on the glass canopy, each one of these to contain seventy-five lamps. Then there will be the words "Liberty Theater" in big letters, each of which is to be worked in electric lights. From reports, this new house of Messrs. Jensen and Herberg will set a standard in exterior illumination for picture theaters. The conception of having the Statue of Liberty with her flaming torch predominating the facade embellishments is unique and novel.

The operating room, it is needless to say, will be constructed of fireproof material. Everything that goes to constitute the equipment of an up-to-date projection room will be installed, among which will be three motor-driven Simplex machines, a dissolving stereopticon and spotlights. The admission prices to the Liberty will be ten and twenty cents.

PLANS NEW THEATER.

E. Fossler, of Los Angeles, Cal., is preparing plans for a one-story brick moving picture theater building to be erected at 6413 Hollywood Boulevard, that city. Miss Pauline de Longpre is to be the owner of the proposed house. The plans schedule it to be a 65 by 100 foot house.

SUFFOLK THEATER, HOLYOKE, MASS.

The Grand Amusement Company, Inc., Holyoke, Mass., proprietors and managers of the Grand and Globe Theaters, Holyoke, Mass., and the Grand Theater, Marlboro, Mass., opened on October 6, 1913, the Suffolk Theater, which is situated at the corner of Suffolk Street and Newton Place, Holyoke. The exterior of the theater is of buff brick with brown stone trimmings. The doors leading into the auditorium are reached by a long approach. The auditorium measures 45 by 80 feet, and it has a seating capacity of 1,162.

The color scheme of the interior is old rose, old ivory and gold, and the effect is rich and impressive. Stucco work in old ivory and gold has been used in ornamenting the fronts of the balcony and the boxes, and in decorating the proscenium. The side walls of the parquette floor are wainscotted up to a height of five feet with Pavanazo marble and from that point up to the ceiling the walls are tinted a deep old rose surmounted with stucco relief work. The ceiling is heavily paneled and handsomely decorated in a soft blending of light colors which adds greatly to the general beauty of the interior. The railings of the balcony and boxes are of mahogany surmounted with heavy brass railings. The doors and other woodwork in the theater are also of mahogany.

The aisles of the orchestra floor are covered with a heavy cork carpet of old rose color. The chairs are framed in a paneled design of mahogany. The boxes are furnished with old rose velvet carpets and chairs finished in gold leaf. The balcony is reached from the foyer by a stairway with a double approach. This stairway is finished in oxidized copper. The balcony is constructed on the cantilever plan. Every seat in the theater commands an uninterrupted view of the stage or the screen. In the rear of balcony is located the operating room, which is constructed of asbestos blocks four inches thick.

There are six boxes, three on each side of the house, entrance to which is by stairway from the parquette floor. The boxes, which seat eight persons each, are almost on the level with the lower part of the balcony, and they occupy space between the balcony and the stage, which location gives the occupants of each one of the boxes an unobstructed view of the screen or the stage. The house is perfectly lighted by the semi-indirect system. These lights are controlled by three separate and distinct switchboards located respectively in the lobby, the stage and in the operating room. The theater is heated and ventilated by the indirect heating and ventilating system. Fresh air is brought in through a huge pipe, and after being heated it is distributed throughout the house, while at the same time the foul air is being sucked out by another large pipe, thus insuring a perfect circulation of pure air constantly.

CRESCENT THEATER, AUSTIN, TEXAS.

MacCormack & Co., Inc., proprietors of the Crescent Theater, Austin, Texas, opened that house on February 4, 1914, in a rather unconventional way. The company had cards circulated among the public inviting them to be present between 11 A. M. and 2 P. M., not only to be instructed in the making of motion pictures through the Keystone subject entitled, "How Moving Pictures Are Made," but also to inspect every part of the Crescent Theater. This, we believe, is a rather unconventional way of opening a new picture house.

The invitation evidently was greatly appreciated, for fully 3,000 persons put in an appearance during the three hours the place was open to the public. The crowds wandered through the entire structure; but the center of attention was the operating room and the machine which the manager, W. T. MacCormack, had installed in the lobby, in charge of an operator who spoke interestingly on the threading of the film, projection, speed of the film passing before the lens, etc. Many of the people expressed astonishment at the size of the picture on the film, for many of them were laboring under the delusion that in order to get such a big picture on the screen, the picture on the film must be quite large. Many other manifestations of bewilderment were forthcoming from the public after they had been told of the workings of the projection machine, dissolving of pictures, and other interesting points about the moving picture industry.

The artistic interior of the house was praised by those who were present on the opening day, and many who are familiar with the construction of picture houses say that it is one of the best built theaters in the Southwest. The operating room is not a part of the auditorium proper, but is built separately at the back of the theater. The entire structure is of fireproof material. Music is furnished by an orchestrion. A souvenir booklet was handed to the patrons on the opening day.

COLUMBIA THEATER, PORTSMOUTH, OHIO.

This pretty little moving picture house was built by the Columbia Company, Inc., in the year 1909, at Portsmouth, Ohio. It is an absolutely fireproof structure, and the auditorium has a seating capacity of 426. The ventilation system is capable of forcing from 12,000 to 14,000 cubic feet of fresh air into the house per minute. Two Power's machines are used and a mercury arc rectifier. General Film Company service is used.

TENTH-STREET THEATER, KANSAS CITY, MO.

Some moving picture theaters, fortunately fewer than ever before, are displeasing to a discriminating eye, because of the exterior view, in many cases gaudy, flashy, and otherwise of unsavory appearance. Other motion picture theaters are entirely different, both interior and exterior and in other points which go to make up the structure. They are dignified in appearance, quiet and alluring on the inside. Such a house is the Tenth-Street Theater, of Kansas City, Mo.

The Tenth-Street Theater, which is one of the four operated by the Standard Amusement Company, of Kansas City, likewise is one of the few houses which charge ten cents for admission throughout the week.

The Tenth-Street Theater is the second house taken over by the Standard Amusement Company, the first being the Palace Theater. The Standard Company purchased the Palace from its original owners in 1909. The Twelfth-Street and Alamo are the other theaters owned by the Standard. This theater, which, incidentally, was not erected especially for the purpose to which it is now put, may have derived its dignity from the fact that it was at one time a bank. The Central National Bank utilized it prior to 1911. The banking institution merged and moved in that year, and H. B. Lappe, president of the Standard, was the first to see the value of the location of the building from the standpoint of the exhibitor. Mr. Lappe promptly secured a long-time lease on the structure, and that course has been justified in many different ways by later developments. The theater has a 28-foot frontage on Tenth Street, and is 135 feet deep. The throw is 112 feet. The lighting system is neither direct nor indirect, but of a style which has not become popular enough to demand a name. The system is, briefly, patterned after that used in footlights, the light being reflected from a tin trough somewhat on the order of the indirect lighting system. The globes are invisible to the audience, being placed in such a way that only the rays of light emerging apparently from squares in the ceiling is seen.

The music is a feature of the theater which has had an important role in popularizing the house. An orchestra provides the music for ordinary films, including comedy, educational scenes and others which do not demand an atmosphere of solemnity or impressiveness. In the latter event, a big pipe organ is available. Officers of the Standard, while not declaring in favor of any particular instrument, do believe that too much attention cannot be lavished on this part of the program. Appropriate music, according to President Lappe, will carry a mediocre film to success, and will make a really good one so impressive that the audiences will send its friends back to witness it. The Standard, by the way, is still experimenting with a view to improving its music. At present, it utilizes, besides the orchestra and pipe organ, a Wurlitzer and a Foto-player in its various houses.

A couple of handsome signs for use in the lobby support reproductions of scenes from current or coming attractions, photographs being used as far as possible. The company also takes advantage of the fact that it operates four theaters, by advertising attractions at the Tenth-Street Theater, for instance, on the screens at the other three. Some newspaper publicity also is used, through the paid advertising columns. The atmosphere of restfulness is carried out on the interior of the Tenth-Street Theater by tasteful decorations, expensive, but not glaring. The carpets in the aisles give an impression of luxury. An exceptionally high ceiling does away with the feeling of discomfort sometimes felt in houses where the ceiling is altogether too low. The seats are well constructed and roomy.

Universal service is used largely, though the company does not cling rigidly to any one program. Features of four or five reels are used occasionally, though President Lappe usually holds a private performance before he accepts a feature of that length. Mr. Lappe believes that such a feature, constituting the entire program for the day, must be exceptionally strong and appeal to patrons on several scores. A daily change of program is made at the Tenth-Street Theater. Power's 6A machines are used exclusively in the Tenth-Street and other Standard theaters. Seven machines are used in the four houses. Motors are used in some instances.

NEW THEATER FOR BERKELEY, CAL.

The new theater being erected at Berkeley, Cal., by Turner & Dahnken, promises to be one of the most attractive houses in the big circuit of this concern. A good idea of its architectural beauty may be gleamed from the accompanying cut, and the interior is to be correspondingly handsome. This house is to be devoted to straight pictures at ten cents and twenty cents, and will be conducted along the same lines as the one that has been operated for several years at Shattuck Avenue. The seating capacity will be about 2,000 and arrangements have been made for installing high class upholstered opera chairs. A six-piece orchestra will furnish music.

Architects Drawing of New Turner & Dahnken Theater, Berkeley, Ca.

Turner & Dahnken are undecided in regard to what will be done with the present theater and there is a possibility that this may be closed. The new theater represents a large investment and indicates the confidence that this large amusement concern has in the college city. The city of Berkeley has a population of about 50,000, but until the Berkeley Theater entered the field it was practically without a playhouse, its amusement lovers going to Oakland and San Francisco. The unqualified success of this house has led to the erection of a larger and finer theater which will soon be opened to the public. The resident manager of the Turner & Dahnken Circuit in Berkeley is G. E. Thornton.

NEW BROADWAY THEATER, SEATTLE, WASH.

One of the latest moving picture theaters to be opened in Seattle, Wash., is the Broadway, located at Broadway and Pine Street. It is considered one of the finest of its size in the city, and has a seating capacity of 450.

The entrance of the Broadway is of Flemish Oak and is decorated with marble together with large mirrors, the front of the building being of glazed terra cotta with an art glass marquise across the entrance.

The interior furnishings include leather upholstered chairs, carpets and draperies being of peacock blue, the walls and ceiling being curved, having a panel effect, also matching the draperies.

Upon entering the theater, two stairways leave from the mezzanine floor, one of the men's smoking room, the other to the women's rest room. A feature of the women's room is a plate glass front, allowing a view of the stage. The theater has the indirect lighting system, and also the latest heating and ventilating systems. The operating room consists of two motor-driven Simplex machines. Four reels constitute a show. Pictures are changed four times a week. The Broadway is managed by George G. Faurot.

GRAND THEATER, NAVASOTA, TEXAS.

We publish herewith a photograph of the Grand Theater, Navasota, Texas. Over a thousand dollars was recently expended in converting the structure, which was originally a store, into a moving picture theater. The auditorium has a seating capacity of 336 good low-back opera chairs, trimmed in blue. There are two wide aisles running from back to the screen. Although a twenty-foot stage has been provided for it has not yet been used. Down in front of the stage is an orchestra pit which contains a style G. Wurlitzer piano. Once or twice a week the managers amplify the music rendered by this automatic instrument by a musician or two.

On each side wall of the lobby and around the ticket booth there is a large mirror. Posters and other advertising matter pertaining to the show is intelligently arranged. In the projection room there are two Power's 6a machines. Five- to seven-day old General Film Company service is used. The house opens at 2 P. M. and runs continuously until 11 P. M. Business has been very good. The Grand is owned and managed by Messrs. Hardy & Eastin.

CROWDS ATTEND OPENING NIGHT.

At each show made up of high-class pictures given in the Idle Hour Theater, Tampa, Iowa, on the opening night of that house, great crowds of picture lovers were trying to get in. The house opened at seven o'clock and ran continuously until eleven. This new moving picture theater is located in the building in West Third Street, and is in the heart of the business district. Messrs Russell and Fife are the proprietors and managers. It is a pretty house and is built of fireproof material.

REX THEATER TO HAVE NEW HOME.

Raymond Godshalk, owner of the Rex Theater, Three Rivers, Mich., has recently purchased property at 144 and 146 St. Joe Street, that city, upon which he is planning to build a new home for his Rex photoplay theater. Work will begin on the new structure in a few weeks. Its dimensions will be 30 by 100 feet, and the auditorium will have a seating capacity of 400. It will be an up-to-date, fireproof structure, and will contain all the latest appointments.

TIMES THEATER, BRONX, N. Y.

The accompanying illustration is a picture of the Times Theater, 786 Courtlandt Avenue, Bronx, N. Y. Mr. H. Richter is the owner and manager. The admission prices are five and ten cents. Ever since the opening the theater has been playing to capacity houses. One of the main features of the house is the excellent piano playing.

"THE MAN WHO CAME BACK" (Beauty Films).

A light drama giving a splendid exposition of the graceful art of the skilled pantomimist, Donald Baxter (Harry Pollard), enjoying wealth and social distinction, is eagerly sought as a prospective son-in-law by a designing woman. When financial catastrophe overtakes the young man he meets with rebuke at the hands of his fiancee.

Scene from "The Man Who Came Back" (Beauty).

Determined to succeed he departs and after an absence of five years he returns well repaid by his efforts. He lets it become known that his valet is the "Klondyke Millionaire," and under the careful tutoring of his master the valet succeeds in winning the affections of Helen Porter, while Baxter cultivates the acquaintance of Mabelle Arnold, a ward of the Porters.

The denouement of the Porters is brought about with a vengeance and in a perfectly delightful manner. Margarita Fischer portrays the demure ward, Mabelle Arnold, and exemplifies remarkable ability as an actress. The subject is deserving of a big success. It will be released on April 21.

"A FIGHT FOR FREEDOM" (Solax).

Exceptionally clever character drawings and close attention to detail in the staging of "A Fight for Freedom" have resulted in a production of real merit. The scene of the drama, which was both written and staged by Herbert Blaché, are laid in a settlement of exiles in Siberia and in Moscow, where the greater part of the action takes place.

The central figure of the story is a beautiful young girl who, with her mother, accompanies her exiled father to Siberia, but succeeds in effecting his escape. He dies as a result of his treatment, however, and she is so embittered by her experiences that she joins a society of revolutionists with the son of a famous general who has been disowned by his father for refusing to execute an order to shoot down his own countrymen during a street riot.

At a secret meeting of the society lots are drawn to determine who shall carry out a decree of the revolutionists ordering the execution of the general. The girl draws the fatal lot and not knowing that the general is the father of her lover arranges to carry out the orders of the society. A statue is presented to the general, who receives it without discovering that the girl was secreted inside of it. His son, however, follows her to the palace and succeeds in saving the general's life, but is captured with the girl and both are cast into prison.

The revolutionists learn of their capture and attack the palace. A long, hard-fought battle in which street barricades play an important part, ends in a brilliant victory for the people with the exile's daughter and the general's son happy at last in each others love.

The ingenuous manner in which the exile's escape from Siberia is effected and the exciting scenes of barricade-warfare in the streets of Moscow are especially interesting, while the unusual strength of the plot, which combines tender heart interest and strong dramatic action with remarkable effect, makes this four-reel photo-drama an extraordinary offering.

"THE DANCE OF DEATH" (Kalem).

In response to the repeated requests that it produce some more dramas along the line of "The Vampire," Kalem Company will shortly release "The Dance of Death," a two-part drama which, like "The Vampire," is built around a dance.

Mlle. Mersereau's "Dance of Death" suggested a story which Phil Lang, scenario editor of Kalem Company, drafted. "The Dance of Death" was completed a few days ago and was shown to a group of critics at a private presentation. All were unanimous in declaring that it was greater and more absorbing than "The Vampire."

In addition to Mlle. Mersereau, two of the most popular Kalem stars appear in "The Dance of Death." They are Alice Joyce and Tom Moore. The locations of the story are laid in the South Sea Islands and America. It will be released Monday, April 27th.

"THE ANGEL OF THE MINE" (Ambrosio).

This feature tells a very sweet and pretty story of a woman's heroism and self-sacrifice. The title "Angel of the Mine" is given to Loretta because she is the friend of all the miners and their families and unselfishly devotes herself to their welfare. On an errand of mercy she falls down a ravine where, after a quick recovery, she discovers a valuable new vein of ore. She informs the owner of the mine, who is much gratified by her loyalty. When later she is annoyed by the unwelcome attentions of a miner the owner rescues her from the ruffian and starts to bring her home. The villian wrecks part of the mine through which the girl and her employer are passing and they are entombed in the falling rocks. The owner being on the point of death is saved by the girl, who infuses her blood into his veins. He engages himself to marry the girl out of gratitude, but his aristocratic mother is offended and urges him to marry a young noblewoman whom her son really loves. When the "Angel of the Mine" grasps the situation she goes back to the mines once more the idolized benefactress of her fellow-workers.

"THE RANGE WAR" (Warner's Features).

Handling a big theme and handling it well seems to be a specialty of the Colorado Motion Picture Company, the maker of this powerful three-part story of the Plains.

"The Range War" deals with the open feud which once existed between the sheep and cattle men over their rights to graze their herds on the open range. The presentation of this drama in motion pictures affords the producing company unlimited opportunities to "put over" lots of scenes that fairly bristle with action and excitement.

Miss Josephine West, as the owner of the circle Dot sheep ranch, gives a clever characterization of her part. Joe Ryan, the clever cowboy, again shines as he did in "The Hand of the Law," by stopping a runaway pair of horses in a spectacular manner and saving the day for the woman ranch owner.

"THE REDEMPTION OF DAVID CORSON" (Famous Players).

The Famous Players Company released on April 10, a four-part subject, an adaptation of the well-known story by Charles Frederic Goss, "The Redemption of David Corson." The title role is played by William Farnum, who needs no introduction to American playgoers. The story is of a young Quaker who becomes infatuated with a gypsy girl. Following the death of his mother he accepts the offer of employment for Dr. Paracelsus, well portrayed by Robert Broderick. The "doctor" is a traveling quack, and he is anxious to make use of the oratorical talents of the young Quaker. David knows that the gypsy girl is connected with the show of Dr. Paracelsus; it is that fact chiefly that impels him to ally himself with the traveling dispenser of cure-alls. When David learns of the marriage ceremony he bribes the justice of the peace who presided, with the result that the girl is informed that her marriage is illegal. She leaves Paracelsus and goes with Corson, who takes her to a clergyman and marries her.

Scene from "The Redemption of David Corson."

When Paracesus pursues, Corson meets him, and in a struggle the former is blinded. From this point Corson goes down. Andy MacFarlane, a lumberman reformed in earlier days through the instrumentality of Corson, is now the one who brings back to the light the man who has turned his back on his early teachings. One day when Corson is speaking in a mission Paracelsus enters and recognizes the voice of the man who has ruined him. The former "doctor" is led to the home of MacFarlane. There Corson invites him to do with him what he will. Paracelsus attempts to stab Corson, but falls dead in the attempt. Corson is led back to Papeeta, and the two are legally married by MacFarlane. All ends happily.

FINE PLOTS DISTINGUISH MAJESTIC'S.

Good stories, with real "punch," continue to headline at the New Majestic studio. "Her Master," written and produced by John B. O'Brien, brings into contact a rich Eastern girl and the sturdy and self-reliant foreman of her father's ranch. The girl has never been in the West and when she arrives at the ranch proceeds to treat the cowboys as servants, which they promptly resent. Her father has not visited the ranch in several years, and the foreman is in absolute charge of everything. The girl is attracted to the foreman, whose attitude of absolute indifference piques her vanity, but when he displays a growing liking for her, she promptly discharges him. The other employees leave and the girl is alone. An outlaw learns that there is considerable money in the house, and the girl is unprotected. He breaks into the house, but the girl, by a clever expedient summons help in the person of the discharged foreman, who vanquishes the outlaw after a thrilling fight and wins the girl for his wife.

In "The Miniature Portrait," written by Frank E. Woods, and produced by John B. O'Brien, a girl has two suitors, a doctor and an artist. The latter paints her miniature, and presents it to her. He asks her to be his wife, then learns that she has promised to marry the doctor. The girl weds the doctor, and a year later the artist returns from abroad and forces his attentions upon the wife. The girl does not care for him, but the husband learns that the artist has called at his home, and suspects his wife. The artist calls again at the house, and the husband, revolver in hand, crouches behind the curtains. He fires, the artist falls, and the doctor for the first time realizes what it means to take a man's life. But the artist is uninjured, the bullet having struck the miniature, which the wife had returned to him. The doctor discovers that he misjudged his wife and humbly asks her pardon.

"THE BROKEN CHAIN" (Kleine-Cines).

The rare technical skill of the European cameraman, the splendid photographic effects of the Southern European sun and the keen resourcefulness of the famous "Cines" producers never were better exemplified than in the two-reel Kleine-Cines subject, "The Broken Chain," which will be released through the General Film Company, Tuesday, May 5. This picture is the product of that popular branch of the "Cines" organization located at Seville, Spain, the company which has created a number of the most successful Kleine-Cines releases of recent date.

Scene from "The Broken Chain" (Kleine-Cines).

A beautiful story of a man's ambition and a woman's sacrifice is told in scene after scene of splendid acting. The settings are characteristic and the staging handled with careful attention to detail. This photoplay will undoubtedly repeat the successes achieved by other productions bearing the Kleine-Cines brand this season.

SOUTH SEA ISLANDERS FOR UNIVERSAL.

Living in the same kind of thatched huts that serve as domiciles in their far off mid-Pacific home, garbed in the same meager habiliments which characterize their daily existence on their native heath, and participating nightly in the weird, uncanny dances and incantations which are a part of their tribal ritual, three hundred South Sea Islanders are encamped on the 1,200-acre ranch of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company near Universal City.

The band of brown-skinned semi-savages will be turned over to the Panama-Pacific Exposition at the end of eight months and will be a feature of the world's fair in San Francisco in 1915. In the meantime the film company, which will utilize the islanders for moving picture purposes, is under $25,000 bond to insure their safe return to the island from which they were brought to the United States. In order that the untutored band of South Sea natives may be turned over to the exposition official intact, armed guard is being maintained over them.

The importing of the islanders is in keeping with the policy of realism now in vogue in motion picture production. They were brought to the United States on a specially chartered ship from the island of Totopoto, in the Marquesas group of the Society Islands, which are under French domination. The first picture in which the islanders will be used is "Lucille Love, the Girl of Mystery."

The islanders are headed by Charley Oom-Puh-Bah, chief of the Totopoto Island village of Amsham, Charley Oom-Puh-Bah is a grizzled veteran of many wars. He was converted to Christianity by a missionary forty years ago, and is able to read and write. The islanders brought with them several tons of spears, shields and other war-making accoutrements, materials for building thatched huts, and many other articles necessary to make complete a South Sea village.

EDMUND BREESE IN "THE MASTER MIND."

The third release of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company will be "The Master Mind," with Edmund Breese, the eminent Broadway dramatic actor in the role he played for eight months at the Harris Theater during the season of 1912.

"The Master Mind" in picture form will be a five-reel production and is now nearing completion at the Jesse L. Lasky studios, near Los Angeles. Cecil B. De Mille and Oscar Apfel are directing the staging of "The Master Mind" and a specially selected cast is supporting the star in the making of the film.

Scene from "The Master Mind" (Lasky).

As a stage play "The Master Mind" enjoyed popular vogue and was presented two hundred times in New York and an equal number of times en tour. The author, Daniel Carter, died while the play was yet running here and one of his last official acts, as author of the piece, was to sign over the moving picture rights to the Lasky company. When, recently, a theatrical concern endeavored to enjoin Lasky from making the screen production of "The Master Mind," the judge, after reading the contract with the author, who was then near death, decided in favor of the photoplay concern and the work continued. Edmund Breese is said to appear as a most virile performer before the camera.

"THROUGH THE EYES OF THE BLIND" (Imp).

Plays of crimes are usually devoted to the melodramatic development of the incident with little else to brighten; too often they are apt to be depressing. It is always pleasing to find a counterplot, a wholesome romance, in such a play. And that is what we find in "Through the Eyes of the Blind," a two-reel melodrama produced by Frank Crane and written by Stuart Paton. It is said that this is the best play Mr. Crane has staged for the Universal Imp company—and Mr. Crane has produced some usually fine ones so far. It is unique in theme with a big, smashing crime story as the main issue with a delightful, appealing counterplot of sacrifice and love.

Scene from "Through the Eyes of the Blind" (Imp).

As the story goes, Irving, a wealthy young artist, goes blind, a happening that puts off his engagement to Ethel. Crushed, Irving leaves her and seeks another city.

Meantime we are introduced to Daisy Dean and her brother. Daisy has been betrayed by young rounder, Hurst, who refuses to marry her. Daisy's brother, learning of it, asks for his name, threatening to kill him. Daisy leaves her brother to bury herself in another city. The brother later discovers a letter from Hurst which discloses his address. He starts out to visit him. Going back to Irving, he finds him living alone, he is in the habit of walking every evening to the end of the road outside his house and back again. Some newsboys knock him one afternoon and when he recovers he has lost his location. Believing, however, that he is going in the right direction, he comes to a house and enters. In the room of death, with the murderer at hand, Irving realizes his mistake. Hurst, in a fight with the brother, has killed him. When Irving again finds himself on the street, he tells a policeman that a crime has been committed, but he is unable to say where.

The rest of the play does with the bringing to justice of Hurst, the great sacrifice of the artist and his girl and the final realization of happiness.

THE OPTIGRAPH HOME PROJECTOR.

The writer had the pleasure, last week, of witnessing a demonstration of the "Optigraph Six," a home projecting machine, taking standard size film, manufactured by the Optigraph Manufacturing Company, Chicago, and was rather pleased with the results accomplished by this little projector. The picture was projected on one of the walls of the office, and appeared remarkably steady and clear. Many people in the trade, no doubt, remember the old Optigraph machine, one of the best and most compact machines that was ever made. John I. Hughes bought all the patents on this machine, and spent eight months in reconstructing and improving the projector.

Among other improvements in the machine may be mentioned a standard one-pin Geneva movement, two or three blade shutter, and a rheostat built in as a part of the lamp house. The lamp is a small arc lamp, well constructed, and will take a five-ampere current from the light socket. The machine is mounted on an ordinary camera tripod. The whole outfit weighs only 20 pounds, and will, no doubt, be very popular with traveling salesmen and lecturers. It will also be very desirable for the home and the school. Mr. Hughes, the head of the Optigraph Manufacturing Company, is well known in Chicago, having organized a number of banks throughout the state of Illinois. G. P. v. H.

"THE KLONDIKE BUBBLE" (Lubin).

An exceedingly exciting and realistic episode of a mining stock deal in which Wolf, the promoter, puts it over on the lambs in beautiful shape, with the object of winning Hattie Lamb, the charming daughter of his victims. The wolf plays his game in spectacular fashion and is eminently successful until someone pricks the Klondike bubble and the millions expected by the lambs look like a Canadian quarter. Everything is on the level as far as stock gambling is, but still it is a gamble and lambs usually get stung; Virtue, however, is entitled to reward and just at the point when everybody wants to jump off the dock, news comes of a wonderful strike of ore. The handwriting on the wall reads "prosperity." Love triumphs and the Wolf is affectionately gathered into the Lamb's fold. The photo story is written by Clay M. Greene and gives excellent roles to Ormi Hawley, Edwin Barbour, Richard Morris, Edward J. Peil and other able Lubin players.

NEW ENGLAND.

WALTER E. GREENE, the well-known New England film man, has purchased the state rights of this territory for "Smashing the Vice Trust." Mr. Greene secured Marcus Loew's St. James Theater for the morning of April first, and gave a private showing to exhibitors. The "run-off" was well attended.

Frank Vine, formerly assistant manager of the General Film's Boston offices, is now located in Pittsburgh as manager of the Electric Film Company's branch there. With Mr. Vine went William Allen, who had been in charge of the General's poster department in the Hub.

The owners of the Moulton Opera House, Laconia, N. H., find business very good indeed, and W. V. Buckley, of the Laconia Amusement Company, is making final arrangements for the opening of a new house in this city, to seat about 1,400. The new house, to be called the Star, is due to open on April 13, with the full Universal program, which service is also used at the Moulton Opera House.

The Star has been built along high-class lines, and no expense has been spared to produce a strictly high-grade theater, being modern and fireproof.

Samuel Bruskett has purchased the Plaza Theater, Malden, Mass., and will run this theater as a straight motion picture house. The Waverly Hall, Waverly, Mass., was formerly owned and managed by Mr. Bruskett, but he has sold this house, to give his entire attention to the Plaza.

Max Wolff, owner of the Alhambra Theater, Lowell, Mass., has sold out his interest in the house to W. B. Bennett, who will continue the theater. The Alhambra, while not a large house, has always been considered a "good bet," and Mr. Bennett is more than enthusiastic over his purchase.

Harry F. Campbell has again added another house to his fast growing circuit by purchasing the Dreamland Theater, Bellows Falls, Vt., from T. F. Kinirv, who has operated the house for several years. Mr. Campbell took possession this week. The Dreamland will be thoroughly renovated, painted and generally improved. A new Power's 6A machine has been installed. The Crve Theater, Pawtucket, Mass., had its initial opening on Sunday, April 5. The house is managed entirely for the education of the foreign element of this city. The management is composed of men of all nationalities, and all foreigners are most welcome. Admission is free, but no American-born person is allowed in the theater. Nothing but American subjects are projected, the idea being to instill the seeds of patriotism into the foreign element of Pawtucket. The photoplays are booked through the educational department of the Universal Exchange, Boston. It is believed that these shows will tend to educate foreigners to American ways and ideas. There were 1,500 present at the show and less than one-quarter of them could speak the English language. Music was furnished by the Polish Glee Club of Pawtucket. The governor of Rhode Island was present as guest of honor, as were many other men, prominent in public life of Rhode Island. J. A. Eslow, general manager of the N. E. Universal Film Exchange, was a guest of honor, being seated on a raised platform beside the governor.

Priest, and is introduced by Rev. Arthur Hunt Chute. Admission prices were 25 and 50 cents. Mr. Chute explained the details of the reels in full, and hymns were sung, in keeping with the traditions of Holy Week.

It is understood that Nathan H. and Israel Gordon, of Boston, interested in many large vaudeville and motion picture theaters, have purchased three different parcels of real estate at Temple and Crown streets, New Haven, Conn., as the site for the erection of another theater in this city. The cost of the house is estimated to be not far from $150,000. Altogether the land area purchased for the theater project is 20,000 square feet, and the price of the property is about $100,000, according to report. Ground is to be broken about May 15, and the opening will be about December 1. The house should seat nearly 3,000 and will be built in the regular Gordon style, which means that no expense will be spared to produce the finest theater in New Haven.

William Lebrecque, manager of the Opera House, Milford, Mass., has settled his differences with the Musicians' Union, and has installed an orchestra of union men.

At Keene, N. H., there are three theaters offering photoplays, and all three of the big exchanges are represented. Manager J. O. Jackson, of the Majestic, uses Universal reels and vaudeville. Manager D. C. Demault, of the Scenic, uses vaudeville and General Film Service, while Manager R. A. Worsley, of the Dreamland, offers Mutual pictures, without any vaudeville.

Strenuous objection by the town clergy and forty prominent business men greeted the petition of Charles Hatch for a motion picture theater in the Winthrop, Mass., town hall, this week. After hearing the opposition, the selectmen took the matter under consideration, and will report later on.

At an estimated cost of $100,000, the old Hyperion theater, in New Haven, Conn., which S. Z. Poli takes over from the Shuberts on May 1, will be made over into a practically new theater. The work on the renovating will be started early in May, and will hardly be completed before fall. The Shuberts' lease expires the first of May, and Mr. Poli then takes the management, having bought the building four years ago. Vaudeville and photoplays will be the policy under Mr. Poli's regime.

Manager D. D. Leader of the Empire, Portland, Me., is featuring the "Adventures of Kathlyn," in addition to the regular General Film service. Business continues very good at this house.

A recent incorporation is the Calais Theater Company, of Calais, Me. The incorporators are Charles Hablow, Louis Bernardini, A. Hablow and Reed V. Jewett. The capital is $6,000.

A petition against the proposed establishment of a moving picture theater at the corner of Charter and Hanover streets, North End, Boston, signed by leading clergy, public school teachers, social workers and parents, was forwarded to Mayor James M. Curley, on April 9. It is claimed that the introduction of a moving picture theater into the crowded districts of the North and West Ends would do much to counteract the present discipline of home, school and church. Among those who are the strongest in their remonstrance against the proposed theater are the clergy of St. Stephen's Church, which is situated on the opposite corner. These people feel that much of the good now done will be reversed by such, and that a photoplay theater would become a gathering place for undesirable transients, already said to be too numerous in the district. They draw attention to the fact that through the efforts of Cardinal O'Connell a great and flourishing Sunday school has been established for the purpose of creating a counter influence to just such amateur excitement as would be created by the theater. Superintendent Alvin E. Dodd, of the North Bennett Street Industrial School, is decidedly antagonistic to moving picture houses in the North End, especially within a few hundred feet of three large public schools, the branch public library, the boys reading clubs, and his own industrial institution where there is a membership of more than 2,000 boys. He declared that the appeal to children made by the moving pictures is tremendous, and so anxious do the boys and girls become to attend, that all incentive to save is lost, and the great advancements of the show are sufficient to upset, to a large extent, home and school training. Exhibitors interested in the above matter are wondering why Mr. Dodd does not run educational moving pictures for the benefit of the young foreigners in whom he is interested, in as much as he acknowledges the strong appeal of the photoplay.

Moving pictures triumphed anew in Dedham, Mass., last week, when the town's 25 to have a moving picture theater barred from the Town Hall, on the plea that it was incompatible with the dignity of the edifice, ended in apparent defeat and disaster. The article in the warrant, protecting the use of the hall for moving pictures, was nearly postponed indefinitely by a vote of 3 to 1. So it looks like pictures for Dedham.

The Boston Post's Elephant Fund continues to receive hearty co-operation from moving picture theaters. This week Manager Charles F. Hodgdon, manager of the Princess Theater, Wakefield, Mass., held a benefit and turned over $12.20 to the Post. Admission was five cents and the matinee was for children only. Manager C. J. Gorman, of the Roslindale, Mass., Theater, held his regular weekly benefit.

Manager Bianchi, of the Premier Theater, Newport, Vt., and the Globe Theater, St. Johnsbury, Vt., is featuring Warner productions regularly at both houses. Mr. Bianchi reports business as being very good indeed.

The St. James and Orpheum Theaters, Boston, both Marcus Loew houses, continue to heavily advertise the Klaw and Erlanger-Biograph features. The latest productions exhibited at these houses are "Seven Days" and "Woman Against Woman." These features are getting across in good shape, and appeal strongly to the audiences. "The Perils of Pauline" also is meeting with unqualified success at these houses.

The selectmen of Winchester, Mass., found a divided sentiment regarding the propriety of permitting a moving picture theater in that town, when they gave a hearing on April 11, on the petition of Mrs. Oren C. Sanborn for a license for the theater. The superintendent of schools favored the granting of the license, but a member of the school committee was opposed to such action. A clergyman spoke in behalf of the petitioner, but a representative of the Winchester Mothers' Association spoke in remonstrance. George C. Colt, of the school committee, objected on the ground that the concentration powers of the children would be affected, and that they would be thinking of the "wild and wooly West," rather than their lessons. He would not mind so much, he said, if but one performance a week were to be given, and that under the proper supervision, but, as he understood it, the plan was for several shows a week. N. M. Nichols, town truant officer, and custodian of school buildings, objected to the granting of the license, but stated that moving picture exhibitions might properly be given under the supervision of the school department. Mrs. N. M. Nichols, a member of the Winchester Mothers' Association, advanced the argument that it would be but another hardship added to the burden of the town's poor families, whose children would want to attend when the parents were not in a position to let them. Mrs. O. C. Sanborn, the petitioner for the license, attended the meeting, but did not take part in the discussion. She was represented by Ralph E. Joslin, former town counsel, who opened the hearing, and explained the nature of the shows to be run, saying that they were to be of a clean and educational nature. Among those in favor of granting the petition were: Rev. Joel H. Metcalf, pastor of the First Unitarian Church; Superintendent of Schools Schuyler F. Herron and Mrs. C. Zeublin. At the close of the hearing the selectmen took the matter under advisement, and will render their ultimatum later on.

Douglas Crane and his wife, and their manager, Fred Belasco, have secured an injunction against the Popular Amusement Company, owners of the Portola Theater, and the R. O. Film Manufacturing Company, to stop a display of moving pictures showing the dancers in action. It is alleged by the complainants that while they were dancing the tango on the roof of the St. Francis Hotel on March 21 for the purpose of being photographed for for the benefit of a charity performance for the Happy Day Home, a moving picture operator for the R. O. Film Manufacturing Company surreptitiously got within range and caught the dancers from start to finish. Ralph Planchu, of the amusement company, states that he bought the films from the company without any knowledge of the circumstances as alleged by the tango dancers and Fred Belasco. Belasco declares that the exhibition of the pictures has injured the drawing power of the Cranes as a theatrical attraction to the extent of $10,000 and asks for damages in that amount. He also asks that the film manufacturing company turn over to the Court all the films they took, so that they may be destroyed. The case will come up shortly in the Superior Court before Judge Seawell.

A co-partnership has been formed between E. L. Gilmore, L. M. Kaiser and George Breck and a recently perfected lantern slide is being placed on the market, the business being conducted under the name of the Vitaslide Company. In appearance it is the same as other slides, but when placed in position objects come into view and pass away with no attention from the operator. The invention has been thoroughly tested out in local theaters and the device is already in demand where known. L. M. Rev. J. M. Dunlavy, who also was in Topeka in the interest of the Welfare campaign, has been in the limelight in his home town of Kansas City, Kan. A Kansas City paper tells of his attempt to break up a moving picture show at Thirteenth street and "L" road, conducted by Mrs. Mary Weaver. The high-handed actions are described as follows:

"Entering the place about 10 o'clock Dunlavy suddenly announced that he was about to stop the pictures and to arrest the operator of the films and the owner of the show. Despite the protests of a number of persons in the audience, the Welfare officer then went to a telephone and communicated with police headquarters. He informed those in charge that a riot was about to occur. He asked that the patrol wagon with several policemen be sent to the show. In the meantime he informed Mrs. Weaver and the operator they were under arrest.

"While the patrol wagon was put in readiness for a hurry run, the police did not take Dunlavy seriously. Patrolmen Dolth and Mogle, who were in the vicinity of the show, were told to go to the place, but to take no action further than to see there was no disturbance.

"Dunlavy waited in vain for the patrol wagon. When he learned the police did not care to interfere with the running of the pictures, Dunlavy allowed Mrs. Weaver and the operator to leave the show on the promise they would appear today in the police court."

IN THE NORTHWEST.

SAFETY in case of fire will be paramount in the new moving picture theater to be erected by A. Anderson at 1131½-1133 C street, in Tacoma, Wash., the plans having been changed at the request of the building department. The new house will cost about $20,000.

Construction of the New Palace Theater, at Hennepin avenue and Fourth street, in Minneapolis, Minn., has begun.

The Mission Theater Company, of Seattle, Wash., expects to open its new Mission Theater, a moving picture house on Fourth avenue about April 14. A house seating 1,900 persons safely in a structure containing no wood, a $20,000 pipe organ and a screen, 13 x 18, entitle the management to make claims for a distinctive photoplay theater.

Moving pictures are being used in the northwest to educate the people to a proper regard for the perils and costliness of forest fires. The films show the discovery of a big blaze and the proper means of suppressing the flames. They are shown at the Forest Fire Conference at Roseburg, Ore., but arrangements have been made for their circulation throughout the affected territory.

The Aberdeen Theater, at Aberdeen, S. D., is reassuring its photoplay patrons with the slogan, "Safety First," in its advertising.

Moore, the lessee of the theater, was an operator for five years and embodied many of his ideas in the building of the house. A rest room for ladies and children, just off the entrance, is another feature. It has a capacity of six hundred.

"Moving pictures have passed the experimental stage in the state institutions," declared Miss Miriam E. Carey, supervisor of the institutional libraries for the Minnesota State Board of Control, in a discussion on "Moving Pictures in the Minnesota State Institutions." "They may be said to have been accepted as a part of the equipment necessary for efficient service." It is one of her observations that travel scenes are the favorites for the shut-ins, especially for those in the state prisons. Comedy comes next. Where a few years ago pictures were used on special occasions in most of the institutions, eight now have regular outfits. Figures may be furnished later showing whether it is cheaper to rent an outfit or to have it a part of the institution paraphernalia.

Wilson, manager of the Majestic, will each hold a third of the stock.

Ralph S. Butts recently made a speech before the Colorado Schoolmasters' Club what was termed "trenchant criticism of the motion picture education." He said, "The lazy perverted sentence 'I should worry (but I shant)' is typical, I think, of the moving picture frame of mind. * * * There is no prompting of the imagination in the presence of the movies. Since the whole story or process is going to be depicted (or else flashed before you in an interlarded epigram) why use the will at all? * * * The joy of personal discovery is gone. The will sees no reason to work and is dormant. The imagination acquires little or no new material and goes to seed. These two the most potent of the educative forces are atrophied. The better the pictures the more complete the delineations, then the more fully and truly do we contemptuously allow our best mental heritage to fall into disuse. Interested? Oh! yes! Amused? Of course. Educated? Most certainly not, if education means anything more than the half registering of half-perceived stimuli upon our gray matter."

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

INDIANA.

THE Eastman Kodak Company exhibit is showing in Indianapolis. A feature of the entertainment is the showing of moving pictures twice daily, and travelogue pictures.

E. J. Cassell, Tremond and Michigan streets, Indianapolis, is erecting an airdome, the first of the season according to the records of the city engineer's office.

Effie Breon, who is doing a mind-reading and magic stunt, has been a money maker for a number of Indianapolis theaters. She played the North Star Theater a week, in a good residence neighborhood, and is now drawing big crowds at the Two Johns Theater, which draws its patronage from colored people and a few whites. The ignorant colored folk think she has a wireless connection with omniscience.

The Warner Feature baring custom house methods of detecting fraud, entitled "The Eye of the Government," has been drawing good crowds in Indiana, Manager Willard, of the Palace Theater, Greensburg, being loud in his praise of results it brought him.

The Irving Theater, in the suburb of Irvington, Indianapolis, has closed, and back of the closing lies a lesson which seems not to have been heeded by the men who took charge of it. The community is a church-going community and a college suburb. The college was formerly a Northwestern Christian university, and though called Butler College now, it still retains the ecclesiastical attributes. Now into this community comes a picture house, and after promising it would not open on Sunday, changes the policy and opens with a film treating of a religious subject. The performance was not only not attended, but every church in the community, and everybody in Irvington goes to church, introduced a resolution condemning the action and urging that the proper rebuke under the circumstances was to withhold attendance, which was done, not only on Sunday, but the rest of the week.

H. L. Whitehead, owner of the house, built it at a cost of $18,000. It is one of the best equipped suburban houses to be found anywhere, and is five miles from any other picture house or daily form of amusement, and in a community of 5,0000 people, all prosperous people of modern means. It looks like an opportunity for the man who can step into the community and with the right sort of plan start a campaign to interest the church people in the educational and clean entertainment value there is in the motion picture house when run for that purpose. But the temper of the people of Irvington must change before the exhibitor who tries to run a Sunday show can hope for any success.

Several Indiana papers have had editorials favoring the bill in congress for censoring motion pictures. The Peru Sentinel, which is typical, says: "Certainly a federal board of censors is advisable, for the motion picture industry is a long way from perfection and there is no reason why the minds of the young, who make up the majority of the patrons, should be tainted by an indecent picture which has been produced solely for commercial purposes."

The Century Theater management, South Bend, Ind., interested the newspapers of South Bend to such an extent in the three-reel feature, "The Famous Battles of Napoleon," that they carried reviews as they do of other theatrical enterprises.

The Kokomo, Ind., picture houses, six in number, are warring on one another. With the re-opening of Pictureland a few weeks ago, the strife began. The Pictureland management put in an orchestra of eight pieces. Now all have an orchestra of eight pieces. The Pictureland was content, but one of the other houses needed something to give the crowd a little more for the money, and a singer was engaged. Now they all have singers. Now they are all fighting hard to do something extra in the way of films, and they are all complaining that there is no money in the game. Meantime, some good is being done. Kokomo picture fiends are increasing in number, and when the trouble does become adjusted, the loss should be charged off to advertising, or whatever goat usually bears the brunt of such feverish methods.

Harry Sommers, proprietor of the Gary Hotel, Gary, Ind., has been appointed Film Censor of Gary by Chief of Police Pontius Heintz. The job carries no emoluments, but as the owner of the Gary, Sommers does not have to worry about his cakes. He says that as far as he is able, he will not peruit the exhibition of any film which should not be seen by children and young girls. He says that it will take lots of his time, but he is willing to sit 'em out for the sake of the kids.

An Indianapolis barker in calling the merits of a thrilling film warns his public to stay away if they have heart trouble. "She died, she died, after seeing this show," he kept repeating. "She lived in South Bend and she died in Greenfield. Her heart leaped into her mouth and she bit it in two."

The barker's version is not exactly authentic. A Miss Watson, of St. Joseph, Mich., did die of heart trouble on leaving a motion picture theater there, but what film she had seen that overtaxed her is not known, nor whether she bit her heart in two, or just bit the end off.

Chief Perrott, of the Indianapolis force, has warned patrolmen to spend less time in "nickel shows." The policemen have the habit to such an extent that the chief had to get mad and write a sarcastic bulletin about it.

In Bloomington, Ind., which is a college town, they have a slogan, "Swat the Pest." The pest is the fellow who always knows ten feet ahead what comes next on the film, and crabs it in a loud, clear voice that is as soothing as a file.

The pest is in his seat. The reel is unreeling, and a young man is seen kissing his sweetheart at the cottage gate. He flickers down the path, grip in hand, onto the train for a large city.

"Poor green guy, he'll forget all about her when he hits the life of the city," announces the pest.

By this time the college boys have him spotted, and as the hero falls for a dazzling doll with vaudeville eyes, the pest megaphones, "he's a goner. The little country girl will be coming to the city to find out what became of him."

He knows in advance the hero is going to get canned and take to drink, and he knows that the doll with the dizzy make-up is to throw him down and that the little sweetheart is on her way. Being an open-faced cuss and anxious to cross the road in front of the auto, he tells all he knows.

When he leaves the show, he is escorted. Before, behind, and on every side are college boys, members of the Sons of Swat. They take him up an alley and initiate him into the order by belaboring him with air blown bladders. It is said to be both humiliating and effective, the Pest being always eager to find a new victim upon whom to wreak his satisfaction.

Clarence Johnson, Chicago, took films of Princeton, Ind., featuring a number of local industries, which were exhibited in one of the local movie houses.

The moving picture art has been made the subject of a number of editorials in Indiana papers lately. Whether there is an influx of a slice from the Universal advertising appropriation or not, it would be mean to even suggest. But it is not hurting the moving picture business to be styled "the plaything for the multitudes," "the hand made of art" (hand made being the only sort of maid the compositor knew about), and a "visualizer of education." There seems to be a curious agreement among editors that "the picture show has come to stay," that being a sentence word for word that an even half dozen used.

"The Battle at Fort Laramie" filled the Scenic Theater, Scottsburg, Ind., for two nights.

Thomas Kemp left his wife, Mamie, because she accepted an invitation of his uncle to go to a moving picture show. The fact came out in Juvenile Court, Indianapolis. Mamie told the court she didn't think the court should blame her, as in her opinion the husband who wouldn't take his wife to a picture show now and then ought to be made jealous. The court suggested a little more picture show as a remedy for the domestic inharmony.

The Paragon Moving Picture Film Company, Omaha, Neb., is negotiating with the South Bend, Ind., Chamber of Commerce for filming South Bend. Something in the history of the town is to be made the theme for a scenario.

The Surprise Theater, South Bend, Ind., one of the best successes in the State, never indulges in the use of adjectives. Boiled down synopses of films to be shown are run, telling a straightforward story of what may be expected, without comment of any sort. The manager of the Surprise must be an advocate of truth in advertising.

"For Napoleon and France" filled the Tokyo Theater, Logansport, Ind., for two nights. The booking following some Napoleon lecture publicity in the Logansport newspapers was well timed for effectiveness, so we are informed. Then, too, it is a good film.

The Central Division, Associated Advertising Clubs of America, holding its convention in Indianapolis, gave over almost the whole of one night session to moving pictures.

Louis Sereiusky, of the Motionscope Company, put on films of the Westinghouse, Heinz Chi-Enamel, the Kahn Tailoring Company and other national advertisers' plants.

Harvey Conover, of the Thos. Cusack Company, also used a projecting machine to illustrate his talk on "Outdoor Advertising and Its Evolution."

Ed Sourbier's new theater, the Keystone, is being rapidly completed and will be ready to open within the course of another month. The house will strive for both comfort and beauty in its appointments, according to Mr. Sourbier.

Phonographic concerts before the pictures start are given at the Majestic Theater, in Madison, through the co-operation of a local talking machine dealer. Manager W. L. Fursman, of the Majestic, is forming what is to be known as the Majestic Scenario Society, which will hold meetings once a week in the rest room of the theater. In addition to discussing scenarios, they will talk on the making of pictures, the personality of some of the actors and incidents of productions. The pictures of the cement industry put out by the Lehigh Portland Cement Company were shown for two nights at the Bijou Theater in Grand Rapids.

The Lyric and Majestic Theaters, of Janesville, have been doing some of the nicest newspaper advertising seen in a long time. Attractive type, judicious use of white space make a two-column five-inch advertisement stand out. Two things remembered are: "If it isn't worth a dime it isn't worth your time," and "A photoplay masterpiece every Wednesday."

The Wisconsin State Industrial Commission has been holding hearings on the proposed revision of the building code which will affect moving picture theaters. Standards will be fixed for construction and an architect or builder can easily satisfy himself that if he conforms to this code there will be little annoyance because of ill-advised safety crusades by municipal authorities.

W. A. Rusco, manager of the Jeffers Theater at Saginaw, did some good newspaper advertising to overcome the effect of what appears to be ill-advised action upon the part of a deputy state fire marshal. Rusco was arrested charged with having three exits locked while a show was in progress. Testimony was made that the doors were equipped with patent devices which could be opened from the inside with slight effort, but not from the outside. The recorder dismissed the case. The newspaper clipping showing the dismissal was used by Rusco with the black line, "The Public Is Safe At The Jeffers." The fire marshal's aid took exceptions to the recorder's decision and the two engaged in a newspaper controversy, the recorder standing on the ground that the local fire chief had qualified as an expert and had deemed the house safe.

Some of the moving picture theaters in Montreal will undergo a quick change in a few weeks, when they will be obliged to comply with the Provincial law governing such places passed at the last session of the Quebec legislature and coming into effect on May 1. Officials in the building inspection department at the City Hall are only awaiting the arrival from Quebec of the official papers, when they will be served on the proprietors of moving picture houses. One of the chief changes necessitated is in regard to scenery and footlights which, with the introduction of vaudeville acts, have become general. The new law prohibits the use of either in a hall having only a moving picture and not a vaudeville license. Singers will still be allowed in picture houses, but a simple platform must be used, unembellished by scenery or footlights.

Mr. Conover, the resident manager, extensively advertised this five-reel subject.

The first children's show on Saturday, April 4, will be a permanent fixture, and it has filled a long-felt want. A special article in the Standard says, in part:

THE DANCE OF DEATH (Special—2 parts—April 27).—Because of Richard's indolent habits, Mabel refuses to marry him. To show his ability to make good, the boy leaves for one of the South Sea Islands as secretary to the U. S. Consul. Richard meets Sahki, a native dancing girl. Shortly afterwards, he makes her his wife according to the native rites. Sahki's heart almost breaks when Richard later tells her he must return home. Although he promises to return shortly, the boy forgets Sahki when he meets Mabel upon his return to the States. Mabel agrees to marry Richard. On the Island of Maukalu, Sahki, with her newborn babe in her arms, waits for her lover's return.

Langbaum, a theatrical manager, comes to the island and sees Sahki dancing before her child. The man induces her to come to America and go on the stage. Because it will take her near Richard, Sahki leaves her home. Nahaku, her sister, goes with her.

The night before their wedding, Richard and Mabel go to the theater. Richard is thunderstruck when he discovers Sahki on the stage. The girl does the "Dance of Death." The weird dance scores a tremendous success. Sahki is compelled to respond to the demand for an encore.

Just as the music commences, her eyes fall upon Richard. Intuition tells her he has proven faithless. Sahki throws herself into the dance, holding the audience spellbound. At the climax, she raises her knife and plunges it into her heart. Consternation reigns when it is discovered that the "Dance of Death" has ended in grim reality. Richard hastens to the dressing room. He clasps Sahki in his arms just as she breathes her last. Nahaku grimly places his child in the man's arms. Thus Mabel finds him. The remorse-stricken man tells her the dreadful story. Filled with pity, Mabel takes the infant from Richard's arms and promises to love it as though it were her own.

THE STOLEN REMBRANDT (Special—2 parts—April 29).—Sterling, an artist, receives permission to make a copy of a Rembrandt owned by McKay. While at work on the painting, Sterling falls in love with Rose, McKay's daughter. Mrs. McKay is anxious to have her daughter marry Sherwood, a society man. Although Rose detests the man, her mother compels her to become engaged to him. She breaks the news to Sterling, but confesses that she loves only him. The artist seizes her in his arms.

Sherwood witnesses the incident and upbraids his fiancee. In anger, Rose breaks their engagement. The fortune hunter determines to secure revenge. Sterling has finished his painting. Sherwood finds it standing underneath the original, wrapped up and ready to be taken away. Awaiting the opportunity, he hangs the copy on the wall while the original is placed in Sterling's wrappings. Later, the artist takes the original home, unaware of the dastardly trick. McKay discovers the exchange the following day, and, accompanied by a detective, hastens to Sterling's studio. During the night, however, Sherwood has entered the place and has stolen the precious masterpiece. Sterling is searching for the painting when McKay and the detective arrive. Despite his protests, the artist is placed under arrest.

Sherwood sells the painting to St. Clair, an unscrupulous art dealer. The two plan to steal more of McKay's paintings. By a clever trick, St. Claire is installed in the McKay household as watchman. Rose, however, discovers the state of affairs when she overhears the thieves conversing. That night, Sherwood enters the McKay home while the millionaire is out. He binds St. Claire and then removes several canvases from their frames. Rose enters. Levelling an automatic pistol, she holds the villain up. McKay returns home just in time to hear his daughter calling for help. The rascals are placed under arrest. Sterling is freed. To atone for their unjust suspicions, the millionaire and his wife consent to the artist's marriage to their daughter.

Jack takes him into the house and shows him an object covered with a cloth. He tells Bill to remove the cloth in three minutes. Bill does as he is bidden, and finds himself in a mixup with a hive of bees. Forgetting his rheumatism, the man races around the room with the bees a good second. Bill calls up police headquarters and officers are sent on the double quick. The officers are stung good and plenty. A passing physician informs them that mud is good for stings. Taking Bill to a nearby mud pond, they heave him into it.

DIPPY'S DREAM (May 1).—Bert, who loves Ruth, goes to the police station to ask her father for her hand. Schnitzel, however, is playing pinochle. Angry at being disturbed, he chases the boy out. The lovers find a bicycle outside the station house. Mounting it, they ride for the minister's. The theft is discovered and all of the five men on the police force go in pursuit. While the lovers are in the minister's house, Dippy, an escaped lunatic, for whose capture a $500 reward is offered, sees the wheel. Mounting it, he dashes away.

Dippy comes to a hill and discards his wheel. He climbs to the summit. Ruth and Bert arrive upon the scene. Dippy finds a box of dynamite and amuses himself by throwing the sticks at the police. Bert creeps upon Dippy from behind and captures him. He secures the reward. Chief Schnitzel, awed by Bert's sudden wealth, welcomes him into the family.

A SECRET CRIME (May 2).—Although a woman of wealth, Mrs. Maynard is a kleptomaniac. She has succeeded in keeping knowledge of her terrible affliction from her husband, but the secret preys upon Mrs. Maynard's mind. She gradually fails in health. The desire to steal is so strong that despite her effort to conquer her kleptomaniac tendencies, Mrs. Maynard pilfers a valuable piece of lace while on a shopping tour. Her husband discovers his wife's secret while she is hiding the lace. Overwhelmed by the awful discovery, he takes her to the country, thus hoping to remove her from temptation.

The experiment is apparently successful. Mrs. Maynard improves in health. Several months later, Maynard runs across an old friend, a jewelry salesman. He invites the man to dinner. The salesman comes, bringing his sample cases with him. Later, the Maynards see the beautiful jewels the case contains. Unable to resist the awful temptation, Mrs. Maynard steals several jewels. She hastens to her room to conceal them. Then comes the realization of her helplessness against the dread mania. The woman falls across the bed, weeping bitterly.

In the next room Helen, her daughter, is amusing herself by copying sentences from the Bible on a slate. The child has just finished one sentence when she accidentally upsets a table. Fearing her daughter has been injured, Mrs. Maynard hastens into the room. Helen proudly shows her mother the sentence she has copied. Examining the slate, the afflicted woman reads the commandment, "Thou Shalt Not Steal." The words strike home. Going to her husband she tells him of her theft. Maynard replaces the jewels before his friend has a chance to miss them. Returning to his wife, he finds her ready to hear his verdict. But Maynard, his heart filled with joy, takes her in his arms. He knows that she has been cured.

THE MASTER ROGUE (Special—2 parts—May 4).—The physical resemblance between Albert and Frank, twin brothers, is startling. Mentally and morally, however, the two are wide apart. Albert is the leader of a criminal band, while Frank, blind, sells papers for a livelihood. Frank is injured by an automobile owned by Prentice, a retired banker. The man takes Frank to his own home. Louise, the banker's daughter, becomes interested in Frank. Albert, meanwhile engages in a smuggling expedition. Discovered by revenue officials, the man has an encounter with them, but escapes. He learns of what has befallen Frank.

The Prentices adopt the blind boy as a member of their family. The banker later offers a reward of $20,000 to the physician who will restore Frank's sight. At the behest of Albert, Armstrong, an unscrupulous doctor, offers his services. Buddy, one of the gang, is deeply attached to Frank. He discovers that the blind boy is to be victimized by the unscrupulous brother. Prentice and Louise bring Frank to Armstrong's office. There, the blind man is kidnapped by Albert's gang, and the Master Rogue assumes his brother's place. Later, Prentice, delighted that the man, whom he thinks is Frank, can see, hands Armstrong a check for $20,000.

Albert returns with the Prentices, while Frank is held captive in the gang's rendezvous. The Master Rogue steals from the Prentice home and returns to the den. Determined that Frank shall not suffer, Buddy informs the police. The police and revenue officials arrive and storm the place. Furious, Albert plans to blow up the building and thus kill his pursuers and Frank. The latter is rescued in the knick of time, however, while a falling packing case pins Albert. A terrific explosion follows. Albert meets his doom. The rest of the gang are either killed or captured. The Prentices learn of how they have been victimized. Frank is brought back to their home. Placing her arms about him, Louise promises to guide him through life.

THE AWAKENING OF BARBARA DARE (April 27).—Ordered by his doctor to go South for his health, John Dare, a young New England clergyman, writes to his college chum, Stanley Clayton, that he is coming to spend a few weeks with him. Stanley is delighted and tells Dorothy, his fascinating sister. Dorothy is much interested, but Stanley teasingly warns her that "a stern New England clergyman is beyond your wiles." Barbara Dare, one of those puritannical old New England mothers, bids John farewell. Upon his arrival at the Claytons, John is given a warm welcome and Dorothy and John are soon deeply interested in each other. They fall in love and are married. John writes his mother, telling her he will bring his bride home. Barbara is fiercely resentful and jealous at the thought of losing her son. When John and his beautiful bride arrive at his Northern home, they find a cold welcome. Everything is strange and stilled to the warm-hearted Southern girl. Her husband is busy getting out a new book, and Dorothy is left much to herself. He leaves town to have his book published, and at the station meets an old friend from the South, Philip Moreland, and asks him to call on his wife. Moreland does so, and Barbara entirely misconstrues Dorothy's delight at meeting an old friend; snatches a bunch of flowers Moreland had brought her and denounces her. Tired of the constant tyranny, Dorothy leaves the house. Dare returns sooner than expected and finds her lost in the snow. She is carried to his home and Dare denounces his mother and tells her if Dorothy dies, he will hold her responsible. Barbara is left alone, unwanted and unloved. One day she hears a cry and going into the sick room, realizes that a baby has been born to Dorothy. Her face softens and her barriers of indifference break down. She goes out in the snow and digs up the bunch of flowers she had thrown out and brings them to Dorothy, who, seeing that Barbara has at last awakened to love and understanding, forgives her.

THE CROSS AND THE CRESCENT (Special—2 parts—April 28).—Sally and Dan Brogan live with their father in a poor quarter of the city. Mr. Brogan is a man of quick temper and the children are often ill-treated when he is in these ugly moods. Dan sees a tattoo mark on the shoemaker's arm, and wants to have his arm tattooed also. To gratify his wish, he breaks open his father's tin savings bank and steals the money from it. Dan shows his sister, Sally, the tattooed design on his arm, with their two names, in the shape of a cross. When his father discovers the loss of the money, and finds Dan has stolen it, he thrashes him. Dan runs away from home and falls in with two crooks, who take him in hand and make him as crooked as themselves. Fifteen years pass and Dan, now an accomplished thief, is still with his two companions. They plan to steal a famous diamond which is on exhibition in a jeweler's shop window. This is successfully accomplished and they hide it in the cellar of the house in which they live .

The task of recovering the diamond and capturing the thieves is placed in the hands of Miss Sally Brogan, now a member of the Secret Service Police. She skilfully discovers the identity of the robber, and tracks him down, but is herself tracked by Dan and made prisoner by him. By chance she sees the tattoo mark on his arm and recognizes him as her own brother. He also recognizes her by a crescent-shaped locket he had once given her and they plan to escape that night. His two former pals become suspicious and watch him closely. Dan helps his sister to escape and is shot and mortally wounded. The two crooks determine to make off with the great diamond and go into the cellar after it. Dan, although suffering from his wound, crawls to the trap door leading to the cellar, closes it and throws his body across it, entrapping the two robbers in the cellar beneath. Meanwhile, Dan's sister has obtained help, and the precious stone is recovered.

SETTING THE STYLE (April 29).—When Mrs. Vandergilt gets her ticket for the horse show, she decides that she must have a startling gown to wear for the occasion. Disgusted with the efforts of the designers, Mrs. Vandergilt thinks that she had better give up the idea of going to the ball and simply to disappear until the event is over. She calls her footman and gives him the tickets, telling him to take them to a friend of her's to use during her absence. The footman gets into a brawl, and in the mix-up, loses the tickets. When he returns to the house, he is afraid to tell his mistress of having lost the tickets, so decides to say nothing about it. It happens that the tickets are picked up by Finnegan, a street cleaner. Having no way to discover the owner of the tickets, Finnegan and his wife make up their minds to go to the horse show.

The day of the horse show comes around and Finnegan and his wife put on their "Sunday Best" and are very much in evidence. They are looked at with curiosity by the society people, who think the Finnegans are representatives of the Vandergilts. They create quite a sensation.

Mrs. Vandergilt, who has been away in Europe, returns home, and finds that all the styles have changed in her absence. Everyone is dressing a la Finnegan. She realizes that the Finnegans have become the arbiters of fashion. The fashion papers are filled with cuts showing how Mrs. Finnegan looked at the horse show. Mrs. Vandergilt purchases a new wardrobe and joins the procession dressed a la Finnegan.

TONY THE GREASER (April 30).—While sightseeing among the ruins of an old mission on the Mexican border, Mary Blake and her father come across Tony, the Greaser, strumming a guitar. Tony is instantly attracted to the girl. Mary listens entranced until the music is finished and then offers him some money, which is gently refused. She smiles at Tony and he stands looking after her with a rapt expression, already in love with the girl.

A little further on, her father falls and sprains his ankle. Mary, unable to help him, runs back to Tony, and between them, they get Mr. Blake to the carriage. He gratefully offers Tony employment on his ranch. Mary smiles in a friendly manner and Tony eagerly says he will come.

THE PLAYHOUSE, NEW YORK

At the ranch, Tony receives rough treatment at the hands of the foreman and cowboys, and seeks solace in his guitar alone in the moonlight. Mary sees the boys tormenting the Mexican and takes his part. Later, Hammond proposes to Mary and is accepted. He speaks to her father, who approves the match.

Tony one day asks Mary for a handkerchief she has been hemming and she says, "Why certainly you may have it." The foreman and some of the boys try to take it away from him and there is a desperate fight. She then tells the Mexican that, while she takes a friendly interest in him, she can never love him. Tony is heart-broken and goes back to his old life in the Mexican quarter. Becoming mixed up with the Insurrectionists, he learns that they are going to attack the Blake ranch. His love for Mary is still strong, and he decides to warn the Blakes. Stealing a horse, he rides like mad to the ranch house. Finding the men have all ridden out on the ranch, he tells Mary to ride after them and he will defend her home. She dashes off and Tony, with the bullets tearing holes in his shelter, holds off the Mexicans. Mary arrives with the cowboys, who, after a sharp fight, drive the Insurrectos into full retreat. Tony has been mortally wounded and dies in the little room he has defended so ably, surrounded by the respectful cowboys and soothed in his last moments by Mary's kind administrations.

BUNCO BILL'S VISIT (May 1).—Masked, and with a revolver in each hand, the notorious Bunco Bill holds up Dick Bowman, robs him and after making him hop about to the tune of his guns, jumps on his horse and escapes. The following morning, Farmer Bunny goes to town to sell his poultry and eggs, completes his transaction, and with a big roll of bills, starts for home. He stops at a saloon to have a drink, sees a report of the operations of the bandit and boasts what he would do to the villain, if he sees him. Bunco Bill is standing right alongside of him, unrecognized. Bunny shows a large amount of money and Bill decides to make John his next victim. Bunny stops at his friend, Dick Bowman's house, and learns the details of the robbery. At home, John's wife gets rather tired of his boasting and says, "It's a pity you men don't do something, instead of talking about it." As a joke, she disguises herself in men's clothes, takes a pistol and mask, and holds him up in the most approved style. She makes him kneel and kiss the floor. He recognizes his wife's shoes and turns the tables on her by opening a mouse-trap and letting three of the little rodents scamper out. His wife, with a scream, makes a wild dash for the nearest chair.

That evening, Bunco Bill enters through the window and orders John to throw up his hands, who, thinking it is his wife again, pays no attention. Bill, with an oath, thrusts two cold muzzles against John's neck and repeats his command. After robbing him, Bill fires into the floor and John dances some involuntary tango steps. Mrs. Bunny hears the racket, grabs her gun, and rushing in, holds up the robber. After disarming him, finding Dick's money and their own, they take Bill to the sheriff's office, where they are heartily congratulated and receive the $500 reward offered for Bill's capture. Amid cheers, John and his nervy little wife drive home, feeling that Bunco Bill's visit turned out to be a profitable one for them.

MAREEA, THE HALF BREED (Special—2 parts —May 2).—Finding Benny, a fisherman, lying on the sidewalk, after being thrown from a saloon, Mareea, a half-breed, helps him aboard his fishing-scow. He asks her to share his home with him, and promises to keep away from liquor. She agrees and learns to love him with all the fiery passion of her nature. As a surprise for Benny on the anniversary of their meeting, she tries to buy a watch, but not having sufficient money, she quietly leaves what money she has on the counter, and takes the watch home to Benny, who is delighted. The store clerk discovers the loss of the watch, and follows her, with a policeman, to the scow. Faced with the accusation, she springs at the clerk like a tigress, and stabs him. She is sentenced to three years' imprisonment for attempted murder. She kisses Benny good-bye, saying wildly, "Benny Mio, you will wait for your Mareea!" and he assures her of his undying devotion.

Without Mareea's influence, Benny drifts back to his old ways, until Jess, a Salvation Army worker, reforms him temporarily and he marries her. Jess, who is of gentle nature, is unable to control Benny and again he takes to drink, brutally mistreating her. Mareea is released from prison, learns of Benny's wife and baby and in a frenzy of hatred and jealousy, goes to the scow one stormy night, determined to kill the child. Benny has come home drunk and despite his wife's protests, goes out again into the storm. Mareea enters and Jess treats her kindly. Mareea stealthily approaches the crib, but at the sight of the little one's face, breaks down. She tells Jess her story and learns of Benny's cruel treatment. Benny is killed by a fall and his body brought in to the two women, who had so loved the worthless fellow. Mareea comforts the heartbroken widow, but her whispered words, "Benny Mio," show that her great love is still her strongest passion.

IN HIGH LIFE (Fifth of the Wood B. Wedd Series) (April 27).—Wood B. Wedd and his friend, Darby Jenks, were in distinctly straitened circumstances. They had exhausted all possible sources of credit, and they could not possibly pay their hotel bill. At last, Darby hotly demanded that Wood B. take immediate steps to better their position. Wood B. was perfectly willing to do anything within reason, except work, so he asked Darby if he had any ideas. Darby had a very good idea. It was simply that Wood B. should marry Amanda Muggs, the rich heiress. Wood B. was delighted. The proposition appealed at once to his romantic and mercenary instincts. So he went out with Darby to call on Amanda.

Amanda was very glad to see him. So was her father when he understood that the young man wanted to marry his daughter. But in spite of it all, Wood B. did not make a hit. To begin with, he was distinctly ill at ease in the gorgeous surroundings in which his new beloved lived. He began by shaking hands with the footman, and breaking a magnificent Chinese vase. Then he spilled tea on Amanda's aunt. Finally, when Amanda's father offered him a drink, Wood B. did curious things with the siphon, effectually drenching the entire party. Amanda's father quite properly ordered him out of the house. But Amanda insisted on his staying and took him into the drawing room. When father found Wood B.'s borrowed hat and cane in the hall he demolished them and started for Wood B. with a long sword.

Wood B. rushed to the pantry, and got into the dumbwaiter. By sturdy hauling on the ropes, he managed to evade the furious Mr. Muggs. Finally Mr. Muggs cut the rope, and Wood B. and the dumbwaiter fell down to the kitchen. The chef, excited by Mr. Muggs' ferocious pursuit of the dumbwaiter, stuck his head in the shaft just as the dumbwaiter fell. The result was heart rendering. At last, thanks to the efforts of the faithful Darby, Wood B. managed to escape from the indignant father. When they arrived at their hotel, a fresh blow awaited them. A neat notice, pasted on the door of their room, informed them that the hospitality of the house would not be extended to them any longer, unless an immediate cash payment was made on account.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SILVER SNARE (Sixth Mystery in the Chronicles of Cleek) (April 28).—When Superintendent Narkom called Cleek on the telephone, and told him that he had an interesting case for him, Cleek was somewhat loath to accept it. The afternoon editions of the newspapers had some weighty news about Mauravania, and Cleek was much interested in Mauravanian affairs. However, a case was always a case, so Cleek set out for the address given him. Before starting, he put on the disguise of an old man. M. de Louvisan, the man who desired to engage Cleek's services, had a strange story to tell. A mysterious terror hung over his house. A strange shadow-like form would periodically appear at his bedside, and call the name of one of his children. Shortly afterwards, the child would be found dead in bed with a silver cord tightly wound about his neck. Four of his six children had already perished, and now a fifth was threatened.

A curious expression flitted across Cleek's face as de Louvisan was telling his story. At the end, he questioned the bereaved father rather sharply. At last, however, Cleek consented to go with de Louvisan to his home. On the street a bulletin on the Mauravanian situation caused Cleek to change his mind suddenly. He was just on the point of declining to go with de Louvisan, when a cab drove up to the curb containing Cleek's old friend, Miss Lorne. She begged Cleek to undertake the case for the sake of Mme. de Lousivan, who had called on her and had begged her to intercede with him. Cleek turned white, and sent Miss Lorne home in another carriage. Then, under pretense of buying some cigars, he called up Narkom in a tobacconist's shop, and set out with de Louvisan.

Cleek's first action after reaching de Louvisan's home was to throw his coat over the butler's head, and to handcuff that worthy and de Louvisan to the bannisters. Then he sped upstairs to the picture gallery, where Madame de Louvisan waited. She turned, saw Cleek, and gave the Apache cry. At once, the portraits on the wall swung out, and in the cavity behind each of them appeared a man with a revolver levelled at the detective. The police arrived in time to save Cleek from a dangerous situation. The whole affair was a Mauravanian plot to put Cleek out of the way. De Louvisan's story had been made up out of the whole cloth. Fortunately, Cleek had recognized de Louvisan as a leading Parisian Apache at the very outset of the adventure.

A FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE (April 29).—There was a mystery about Jim Crogan. Nobody knew who he was or where he had come from. As a matter of fact, nobody cared. In the broad, free land of Alaska, men are taken for what they are or what they will be, rather than for what they have been. Useless questioning of antecedents is severely frowned upon, and a few ounces of lead has occasionally been the reward of the over-curious. When the new school teacher arrived at the little mining settlement, she seemed to take an unusual amount of interest in Crogan. They went snow shoeing together, and hunting together. The girl seemed to admire Crogan immensely and there was no contradicting the fact that he was madly in love with her.

On Christmas eve, the school teacher gave a party in her cabin. Jim Crogan was the last to leave. A card case dropped from his coat at the door. The school techer picked it up, and examined a photograph it contained. Then she gave a sigh of satisfaction, and hid the case. When Crogan returned in some agitation and asked if she had seen it, she replied with a flat negative. The next morning the school teacher called on the deputy marshal, and introduced herself as Mary Burke, of the U. S. Secret Service. She informed the marshal that Crogan was actually James Thurston, a defaulter, and asked him to send men to capture Crogan, to her home at eight that night.

That evening Crogan called and told the girl he loved her. Then he confessed what she already knew, that his name was actually Thurston, and that he was wanted for the theft of government funds. He had not stolen the money at all, but had assumed the blame to shield his brother, who had married the woman Jim had loved. The girl listened to the story, and believed it. In a spasm of remorse, she told the man what she had done, and urged him to escape. When Crogan threw open the door, the deputy marshal and his men were waiting outside. Crogan, without a word, held out his hands for the handcuffs, but the deputy marshal laughed and handed him a newspaper. In it the dazed man read that his brother was dead, and that he had made a full confession on his deathbed.

WHEN EAST MET WEST IN BOSTON (April 22).—When Henry Clark, foremost authority on Sanscrit, issued a statement on a disputed word-form in the Rig-Veda, etymologists trembled.

When Henry Clark, A.M., Ph.D., Litt. D. received word announcing that a friend of his father's on his deathbed had expressed a desire that Henry should marry his daughter, it shook all the Sanscrit roots out of Henry's head. He never thought of marriage. Still, anything to oblige an old friend of his father's! So Henry wrote an awkward letter to Ruth Maitland, the girl in question, telling her how glad he should be to meet her and how sorry he was that his profession would keep him from leaving Boston until the following summer. When Ruth received Henry's letter she giggled and after a little thought, decided to go to Boston and see what Henry was like.

In New York Ruth was very frigidly treated by an English girl whom she offered to help. On the train, she heaped coals of fire on the other's head by paying her fare when the English girl discovered that her purse was missing. An intimacy rapidly developed between them. Ruth discovered the girl's name was Jessie Parker, and that she was bound for Boston. Later, to her amazement, Ruth discovered that Jessie was going to visit the Clarks.

Henry knew of Jessie's coming and at the entreaties of his aunt, had promised to meet her. With characteristic absent-mindedness, he forgot all about the train. When the girls arrived, there was no one to meet Jessie. So the two girls wandered about the crooked Boston streets for hours in hopes of finding the house. At last, after Ruth had knocked down one too-helpful stranger, they arrived at Henry's house. And now comes the unexpected part of the story, for Henry fell madly in love with Jessie, while Ruth married Jack Ashton, Henry's cousin.

FREDERICK THE GREAT (Special—2 parts—May 1).—The story opens in Frederick's youth. Frederick William, his father, was a rough, burly man, fond of outdoor sport, a hearty eater and a heavy drinker. Because his son was frail and delicate and more interested in intellectual matters than in sport and hearty living, Frederick William hated him. He forced Frederick to drink and smoke, and on one occasion when the boy defied him on the subject of a favorite flute, attempted to strangle his son with a window cord. From these joyless days we shift to the tragic death of the old king, hastened by the receipt of an insulting message from the Austrian emperor. With his dying breath, Frederick William besought his son to avenge him. Frederick heaped coals of fire on the head of his dead father by laying Austria waste in the terrible Seven Years' War.

Amalie, Frederick's sister, fell in love with Baron Trenck at first sight, and their love that started in the palace garden at Sans Souci lasted all their lives. But if it started with roses and moonlight, it ended with ashes and rue, for years later Trenck was imprisoned by Frederick on a charge of high treason. Amalie pleaded for her lover, but in vain. The king was obdurate. "Even as you have taken from me the only thing I loved," cried the poor princess, "so may God deal with you, brother." Frederick did not have long to wait for the fulfillment of his sister's prayer. The discovery that Voltaire, the great French philosopher, whom the king had honored with his friendship, was playing traitor, nearly broke Frederick's heart. A tremendously dramatic scene shows the king reviewing his army for the last time, and raising his trembling hand to the salute as the flag passes. Last of all, we see the great king, lonely for all his greatness, talking to two little peasant children in the grounds before his palace.

HER GRANDMOTHER'S WEDDING DRESS (May 2).—The Talbots were very poor. With many another proud old family they had been stripped of their possessions and ruined by the Civil War. So when June Talbot learned of an approaching dance at a nearby plantation, her delight was mingled with a very real regret. She could not possibly afford a new dress, and there was nothing she could wear. By chance, she discovered her grandmother's wedding dress in an old trunk. It was terribly old-fashioned, of course, but it was infinitely better than any of June's poor clothes. So she wore it to the dance. They were not very kind to June at the dance. She heard them laughing at her dress behind her back, and it naturally made her unhappy. But when Dick started to tease her, Jim came to her assistance and told Dick to stop. When Dick persisted, Jim hit him, and Dick fell to the floor and lay, to all appearances, dead. Jim, dazed and trembling with horror, wandered out of the house. The sight of Dick's apparently dead body seemed to snap something in his brain. With the blind instinct of a hunted animal, he fled. And when he fell among desperate characters, the blind instinct told him only that with them he could find refuge from the terror behind him. Bull Dog Mike, Slippery Jim, and Billy the Kid, took very good care of Jim. Discovering that the man had the intellect of a four-year-old child, they taught him the tricks of their trade, which was burglary.

Meanwhile, Dick had entirely recovered from the temporary affects of Jim's blow. June and her mother were left an unexpected legacy and moved into the city. June had never gotten over Jim's disappearance. He had meant a great deal to her, and his unaccountable absence hurt her. One night she came across her grandmother's dress. Moved by a sudden impulse, she put it on. Then, musing on the poignant memories the old dress called up in her mind, she went slowly downstairs to look at her grandmother's portrait. There was an open window behind the portrait. A man with a white strained face stood looking at the portrait in puzzled wonder. As June entered, he turned and looked at her. As he looked, she could see the light of reason coming into his eyes. With a glad cry, he sprang toward her. Somewhere outside a revolver barked and Bull Dog Mike's late catspaw sank to the ground with a bullet through his arm. He had his wits back and the finest girl in all the world was telling him that he wasn't a murderer and that she loved him.

his son and all ended happily. Their tangled lives were untangled.

CURING A HUSBAND (April 29).—His greatest fault was drink. His wife had pleaded with him time and time again to leave the terrible stuff alone. One night he left his home, went to the club and proceeded to get "filled."

Late that evening or in the wee small hours of the morning, he took a machine to go home, but failed to get inside and fell into the slushy street. A cabby nearby volunteered to take him home, but Robert was determined to drive the horse himself—and he did. He blocked the traffic and had a terrible time. When he arrived home he found a note to the effect that his wife had deserted him, but his child was there, so he knew she was not far off. He promised her, however, that he would never drink again and, when you witness this picture you will agree that he never will.

PIE FOR SOPHIE (April 30).—Snicklefritz and Jobberwat, two German musicians, invade the town of Snakeville and, after wishing some of their terrible music on the cowpunchers, are roughly ejected. Wandering along the railroad track, they finally discover the home of Sophie Clutts and decide that it would be advisable to play for this charming belle. Sophie greets them with a panful of hot water. They finally steal her pies. She captures Jobberwat and takes him by the ear to the town lockup. Snicklefritz steals her clothes and poses as the wife of Jobberwat. He creates a lot of sympathy and the bad man of the town takes up a collection for him. The two men are about to leave when Sophie returns, claims her clothes and has them both thrown into a dark cell. The situations are humorous and the action great.

BRONCHO BILLY'S CLOSE CALL (May 2).—Broncho Billy, an express messenger, saved the life of Geraldine Burke, a school teacher. They learned to love each other and later married. One day, the village gossip informed some of the cowpunchers about town that Geraldine was entertaining a gentleman in her home. Broncho Billy was soon given the news and determined to settle with the critter immediately, but on second thought decided that if she loved him better than her husband, she could have him. That afternoon the messenger is shot in a gambling den. He refuses to allow the doctor to give him medical attention, but when the news is brought to him that the man Geraldine was entertaining is her brother, he decided that he wants to live, and the doctor pulls him through.

SEEDS OF CHAOS (Special—2 parts—May 1).—Richard Morgan, John Booth's employer, appropriates a certain amount of money from the firm of Morgan & Company, and in order to escape the penalty, places the blame upon Booth. Certain leaves of the ledger are discovered in Booth's desk—Morgan had placed them there. Booth is sent to prison. Mary, the wife of the convict, to support her child becomes a trained nurse. Some time later Morgan becomes a victim of brain fever. Mary is sent from the nurses' association to take care of him. Her careful nursing restores Morgan to a normal condition, and the doctor tells the broker that Mary had saved his life. Morgan is grateful. Several days later, while reading to Morgan, Mary discovers an article concerning her husband, that he is again up for trial. Morgan takes the paper from her and reads the story. After a night with his conscience he decides to sacrifice himself, and consequently the next morning he tells Mary that he is guilty of the crime her husband is being tried for. In gratitude Morgan goes to court, where he openly declares himself before judge and jury as being guilty. Thus a man is regenerated and husband and wife reunited. Morgan, though a crook, had proved himself to be a man and the stain of guilt is removed from the shoulders of the honest employee, John Booth.

SELIG.

HER LADYSHIP (Special—3 parts—April 18).—"Her Ladyship" has for this theme the marriage of a lady of noble birth to a self-made merchant, the strenuous efforts of a selfish, jealous, though superficially pious sister-in-law of the husband, to selfishly disrupt the union. Richard Dixon, the plain-spoken, but not over-diplomatic husband, is made to believe that gentle Lady Cecil married him for his money alone, while her ladyship, through the same insidious channels of information, is almost convinced, through the apparent inconsistency of events, that her husband wished selfishly to elevate himself socially through an alliance with her. Lady Cecil has a startling reversion to the wild ways of her girlhood, and dropping her dignity, seeks forgetfulness and excitement in the wildest sort of gaiety. Her husband is spurred to deeper dejection by the colorful insinuations developed by the new sensational conditions noted by the jealous Janet Marsh, his sister-in-law. He is worked up to such a frame of mind that he is made to readily believe that one of his guests, Lord Sedley, who has been thrown considerably with her of late, was a former fiance of hers, and, furthermore, that Lady Cecil has acquired the elopement habit. As a climax, through a cleverly obtained scheme, Janet makes it appear that Lady [illegible] about to further disgrace Richard by an [illegible]

The guilty Janet's scheme for preparing an unusually strong sleeping potion for Lady Cecil is overcome by little Elsie, the nine-year-old daughter of Dixon, who tells of her aunt entering the room while Lady Cecil is absent at a ball, while Walter Dixon, Richard's nephew, corroborates the testimony of seeing her there, examining the drug vials at one o'clock in the morning. Through this testimony, and events following, the husband is brought clearly to see the great conspiracy in his family. He is happily reunited to his wife; she has a better understanding of him, and the mischievious and malignant Janet is driven from the scene.

THE GAME OF LIFE (Special—3 parts—April 25).—Robin Hale, a mushy multi-millionaire, is addicted to strong drink and it finally dawns upon him that he must either give up whiskey or his hold on life; so he concludes upon an original plan—to abandon the haunts of men, take himself off to an uninhabited island and live the life of a recluse for a time. He is in love with Cleo, but she is a high-spirited young woman, and while she likes the millions, she dislikes the mere man-possessor. Consequently, the sodden Hale hardly staggers out of her presence before natty Paul Lawler nimbly steps in and appears to have her heart and hand. Lawler, who had pretended to be Hale's best friend, urged upon him the advisability of going away and overcoming the drink habit. This possibly may have been primarily philanthropic. Latterly it proved to be supremely selfish. Lawler lays all the plans for deporting his friend on his own yacht, and then losing him upon some forgotten island in the foreign seas. While poor Hale is stolidly making plans for sailing, Lawler and Cleo are having clandestine meetings that are discovered and render the soul of poor little Jo, the foster sister, to Cleo.

Robert Hale, together with his false friend and others, sails away on his private yacht for his lonely home in the far-off islands of the sea. There he is comfortably marooned and supplied with firearms, so that he can live, if necessary, by his own efforts, upon the island, which has wild goats and the usual tropical fauna. His yacht, on the return trip, founders and all hands perish, except Paul Lawler, who escapes with the chart of the island, marking Hale's location, and so he comes joyfully back to the waiting arms of Cleo.

Cleo and Lawler plot to secure possession of Hale's property. Cleo burns up considerable incriminating evidence against herself and her lover. While she is occupied in this incendiary task, Lawler comes upon the scene, interrupting her before it is finished. The precocious child of the servant in Cleo's house comes into the room in search of some material with which to fill her sawdust doll that has ripped open. She picks up a crumpled bit of paper and stuffs it into the doll; the paper happens to be the chart of Hale's whereabouts.

Jo, the foster sister, finally becomes so objectionable to Cleo, that her punishment is determined upon. Poor Jo leaves the unpleasant neighborhood of Cleo and goes away. The servant's little girl, as a keepsake, stuffs into her trunk the rag doll.

Time is passing, and in the interim, Hale's island is destroyed by a volcano. Hale escapes in a boat with only the barest necessities of life and happily lands upon another island, where he now fights for bare existence. A passing ship observes the destruction of the island, the captain tells the story of it, it finds its way into the columns of a paper, and the guilty pair charter a yacht to visit the site of the island to make doubly sure of the death of Hale. Fate pursues them like a Nemesis; their own ship catches fire, and they, in a frail boat, after experiencing the tortures of thirst and starvation, are tossed ashore upon the island where Hale found refuge. He finds the pair unconscious and carries them to his own rough retreat. There he discovers incriminating documents upon the man and the marriage license upon the woman, together with newspaper clippings which show the dark drift of their criminal intention.

Hale revives the pair—the members of the triangle come face to face and the guilty ones see the horror of their fate in the grim and grizzled, half-wild man clad only in skins, as he accuses them of their perfidy. Hale mercifully allows them living space on his island, but divides the territory with a warning that they must not infringe. They, however, begin to plot and plan, and one day steal into his section unobserved and try to brain him with a club. A terrific struggle ensues in which the two men battle on the edge of a cliff, and both go over. Lawler falls to the bottom and is instantly killed. Cleo, in endeavoring to help him, falls after him and finds the same death. Hale, immuned to hardship, wonderfully rugged and athletic, survives his injuries and lives on his lonely island.

Away off in the big city the little foster sister one day, in looking over her possessions, comes upon the rag doll and finds the missing chart stuffed into it, revealing the location of Hale. She immediately charters a steamer and rushes to the rescue. She is accompanied by faithful legal friends. Eventually they find Hale and restore him to his rightful estates, so that he is triumphant in the game of life.

SHOTGUN JONES (Special—2 parts—April 27).—Thomas Lattier is a well-to-do Westerner in the cattle business. One fine day he sells a herd of cattle, receiving for it cash payment in bills of large denomination. He proceeds to town alone to deposit it in his bank. Two bad men, Bretall and Hayes, have learned of the deal and trail him with a view to securing the money. When he makes his lone camp for the night, the two villains try to ambuscade him, but he discovers them and, as they open fire, de detaches his money-belt, places it in his boot and throws it away in the bushes. Then he makes for his pony and tries for a get-away. Finally they "get" Lattier—he falls out of his saddle dead. They come up, examine him, but fail to find the money-belt.

About the time of the tragedy "Shotgun" Jones, a stranger to the country, leaves town and starts out with a pack animal to win his fortune. It comes to him in most unexpected fashion, as he finds the money-belt filled with money that had been abandoned by Lattier. The two prowling villains see Jones just as he picks up his treasure-trove and start for him. A cowboy happily coming up, joins him and they put up such a good fight that the outlaws are glad to get away with whole skins. Jones having found a small fortune, discretely goes to Canada and buys a ranch. In the interim, Tom and Sally, the young son and daughter of the dead man, cannot meet a mortgage on their place and it is foreclosed, so they come to town to shift for themselves.

Sally obtains a job as waitress in a restaurant, while Tom has been hired out for service in a livery stable. This town is just across the Canadian line not very distant from Jones' ranch. The same chance which takes many crooked men over the border has induced Hayes and Bretall to ride over the line and resume their nefarious occupation of "rustling" in the Queen's Dominion.

One day ranchman Jones comes to town and in search of a square meal, happens into the restaurant where Sally is the reigning divinity. A careless cook scalds her and the big hearted Jones orders her taken to his ranch, where she can have the best of care. During the interval of her convalescence, "Shotgun" grows more and more interested in the fair patient and regard soon ripens into love. In the same neighborhood is the ranch of Daly, formerly the partner of Lattier. One day, while Jones and Sally are riding, his ancient enemies, Hayes and Bretall, spy him and start their usual shooting tactics. Sally escapes and goes to Daly's ranch for help, while Jones rides off beyond the horizon, pursued by the desperadoes. Eventually, his skill as a back-shot serves him so well, that he kills both of his pursuers.

The cowpunchers, with Sally at their head, dash up as Jones is bending over Bretall's body. Certain papers have fallen out of the dead villains pocket, which gives Jones the first clue as to the death of Lattier, and the ownership of the money-belt that he found. In a moment comes realization that he, himself, is the man who has profited by the loss of the orphaned children, Tom and Sally (the girl he had befriended). That night he has a tremendous struggle with his own conscience in the ranch-house and finally concludes that the property all belongs to Sally and her brother, for it had all come to him through their father's lost money. He writes a note to her explaining the circumstances, puts a diamond cinch on his pack, and goes out in the early morning, again a mere roamer in the world. The note is discovered before "Shotgun" has gone very far, and Tom and the whole outfit immediately start to trail him. They come upon him. They insist upon his coming back, but he stubbornly will not yield up to their arguments. Sally rides up just in the nick of time, and her persuasions win him back to the ranch. There, as usual, love finds the way, and "Shotgun" Jones, who has used the money to such an advantage that its power had increased very materially, becomes a co-sharer with the two rightful heirs, who are glad to have him made the head of their family.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN (No. 10—Special—2 parts—May 4).—Kathlyn and her sister, Winnie, have hardly disappeared through the trap leading from the big animal cage to the tunnel that had been burrowed beneath, than the hungry and frenzied lions that were in the arena swarmed onto the stage and began clawing at the trap, excited to ferocity by the fresh scent of human beings. This sensational disappearance naturally excited and surprised the vast assembly, and the scene in the royal box where Umballah was presiding baffled description. At first the dark Prince and his Councillors could hardly believe their eyes, and thought it was only a trick of the performers to temporarily escape the arena lions. But they waited for the return of the intrepid Kathlyn and her sister, in vain, and finally the uproarous crowd was indignantly dismissed. Umballah was baffled again—truly puzzled over the surprising situation when one of his adherents, a native Prince, brought him word that Kathlyn, her father, Bruce, and her sister were outside the walls. This stirred Umballah to pernicious activity, and he at once ordered the captain of the Guards to start a detail on the run, make them prisoners and bring them all back to the palace.

Fast following their escape, Kathlyn and her supporters accepted the hospitality of Ramabai's home. The latter had arranged with a prominent revolutionary leader to finance a movement against the false and insolent rulers of Allaha, particularly Prince Umballah, who never neglected an opportunity to crush the weak beneath his heel, and add to the suffering of the people. The new arrivals are not long learning this ambitous plan and their familiarity with the methods of Umballah, and the fact that they have repeatedly outwitted him, moves naturally for their selection in the leadership of the revolution. Quite appropriately it appears that Kathlyn should elect herself to lead such a dangerous coup d'etat. Her own habiliments might have marked some feminine weakness that would have disqualified her for leadership, but happily she finds a suit of armor in Ramabai's home, dons it, and becomes a real Joan of Arc, an Evangel for the new cause of the people. This Amazon wears ancient silver armor, but she has swinging at her side an automatic gun of the latest design, which brings her up to date, and which she uses with accuracy.

Unable to discover Kathlyn, the captain of the guard returns to Umballah's palace, and the latter cunningly bethinks him of Ramabai's house, and orders a second expedition. The captain of the guard, however, unfaithful to Umballah, now bargains for his mercenary services with the revolutionists. Just at this time, the palanquin from Umballah's palace passes with one of his ladies of the Harem. She overhears the plot, orders her attendants to take her at once to the palaces. Umballah is notified and immediately prepares a counter-action. He orders the captain of the guard thrown into the lion's pit, offers large bounties to the soldiers who remain loyal, and then by a lucky stroke captures Bruce, Ramabai and Col. Hare. But, he did not count upon the real leader of the revolution, Kathlyn, who hurries to the scene of action, leading the charge against Umballah's dispirited soldiers.

The imposing Amazonian figure of Kathlyn fills her followers with confidence in her leadership and they finally fight they way into the very palace of Umballah. Then the revolutionists release the captain of the guard from the lion's pit, but fail to secure the keeper, who, in turn, opens the door and drives his lions scurrying through the palace. A native slave warns Kathlyn and her party of this new danger confronting them. During the scramble to get away, Kathlyn becomes separated from her father and Bruce, and they, having in the interim accidentally gained their own freedom, start out to search for her.

In the meantime, Kathlyn has been trailed by a huge and hungry lion, and darts into a seemingly vacant house, where she finds other lions sequestered. She rushes up to the top balcony of this villa, and helpless to extricate herself from the dilemma, raises her voice, calling for help. Umballah, who is trying to make his own escape from the revolutionists, in a palanquin, hears her, and in mocking response to her cry for aid, cruelly applies a torch to the building, leaving her trapped amid the surging clouds of smoke on the upper balcony with hungry lions waiting below. (To be continued.)

THE INVENTOR'S WIFE (Special—2 parts—April 29).—John Ward, electrical expert in charge of the laboratories of a large electrical corporation, is at work on filament which will greatly reduce the cost of lighting. Constant application to his work necessitates Ward's continual absence from home. This causes a misunderstanding between him and his wife. A rival corporation of Ward's firm sends their most trusted woman expert as a spy to obtain work in Ward's laboratory and incidentally to secure the secret of his invention.

The woman, Ellen LaRue, makes rapid progress towards discovering the secret process, after she is once installed in the laboratory. She discovers the growing coldness between Ward and his wife, and she deliberately attempts to alienate Ward from Grace by offering her love to him. She misinterprets Ward's admiration for her skill as an expert for growing love on his part. Believing she will ultimately cause a separation between Ward and Grace, and then wed Ward herself, she delays sending in reports as to the progress of her crooked work in the laboratory. She mentally determines that if Ward will wed her, she will abandon her dishonest project.

Ward is suddenly subjected to an attack of heart failure. His brother, Kenneth, a heart specialist, comes to Ward's home to stay with him during his illness. Ellen reports daily in Ward's home study to assist in carrying on the work on the invention, which Ward refuses to abandon. Grace, believing that Ellen and her husband are secretly in love, grows jealous. She commands Ward to discharge the woman. Ward refuses. Later, in the library, Ellen declares her love for Ward. Astounded, he removes her arms from about his neck and declares truthfully that he has never loved her. Grace, looking through the door, has seen enough of the scene to confirm her suspicions. When Ellen leaves the house Grace follows her with a revolver. Ellen, angered by Ward's abrupt refusal of her love, now determines to take the final notes on Ward's invention, which is now complete. She proceeds from Ward's home to the library. Grace following her. Grace sees her enter the laboratory and secretly follows. Kenneth has seen Grace leave the home, and fearing trouble, has quietly followed both women. Grace finds Ellen's dead body in the laboratory and flees in terror. Kenneth has witnessed the scene in the laboratory and remains behind to work out the mystery. Grace is sought after at her home by detectives, on the same night, and accused of the crime. Ward, hearing the damaging evidence, believes her guilty, and refuses even to touch the woman who has, in his belief, committed murder. At the height of Ward's denouncement of his wife, Kenneth enters to explain that Ellen was killed while tampering with a powerful switchboard, part of Ward's apparatus attached to his invention. Ward then learns for the first time that Ellen was a paid spy and a crook. He can only forgive Grace, and as husband and wife kneel beside their little girl's bedside, a mutual understanding at last comes to them.

A PACK OF CARDS (Special—2 parts—April 30).—Pierre, a trapper in the Canadian Northwest, treats his wife, Toinette, brutally. His friend, Jean, has his evil eyes upon Toinette, but she hates him. Paul Trevor, N. W. mounted police, meets the girl in the woods one day and helps her with the furs she is dragging. Later they meet several times by accident. One day Pierre sees them together, and, going to the post, registers a complaint against Paul. The commandant sends the young man off on a mission, carrying him further into the North. As he passes Toinette's cabin he finds the girl, almost frozen in the snow, where her husband, in a drunken fury, has thrust her out of doors. He takes her upon his horse and tells her he will take her far away. A storm arises and they seek shelter in a deserted shack. Here her conscience awakens—she must go home. She sees his kitsack and asks where he was bound for. He flings his papers across the room and tells her he has but one thought now—herself.

In the meantime, Jean and Pierre lose all—their money and furs—and a quarrel arises. A duel is fought and Pierre is killed. In the deserted shack, Toinette makes Paul see things in their right light and he takes her home. She finds her husband's body and her screams bring Paul into the cabin, where he is found by two men of the post, who enter the house to seek shelter from the storm. The fact that he was discovered leaning over the dead Canuck, knife in hand, with Toinette hanging about his neck, is suspicious and they take him into custody. A man is sent from the post to watch the house. Toinette finds a card under the table and recognizes it as one of a pack belonging to Jean. She interests the mounted man in her discovery and he agrees to go with her to Jean's cabin. The gambler starts in surprise as Toinette enters and she shows great friendship for him. She pretends to know nothing of her husband's death and drinks with Jean. But it grows late—she must go home. He wants a kiss. She finally agrees to play a game of cards for the kiss. He agrees and flings down the greasy pack. She insists upon counting them first. The man outside is watching every move. "There are only fifty-one here," she says. At this, the waiting policeman rushes in and after a terrific struggle, leads Jean to the post. All is explained, and Paul freed. He goes into the North on his mission, and she promises to wait for him, for she knows he will return.

THE GETAWAY (May 1).—The county tax collector discovers a money shortage in the department of his office presided over by Charles Herwin, sickly old man of fifty, and his daughter, Flora. He places the matter before the grand jury, of which Earl Holt, a wealthy young man of thirty, is the foreman. After questioning Flora, all the members of the jury, except Holt, are in favor of indicting the girl. Holt gives a prearranged signal from the jury room window to a friend, Fred Cross, and the latter speeds away in a taxi. The Merwin home is watched by two detectives, Daniels and Glover. Daniels, noticing activity in the house, forces his way in and finds Flora and her father packing trunks. Cross arrives with the intention of aiding Flora and her father to leave. Cross attacks and overpowers the sleuth. Flora and Cross then leave in the taxi with one of the trunks and Glover gives chase. Flora and Gross leave the taxi at an alley and the machine goes on with the trunk before the detective turns the corner. Glover trails the taxi to the railroad station and is surprised to find the cab empty, but waits to see the trunk claimed. Al Kelly, another detective, is sent to the Merwin house to make the arrest. Meanwhile, Flora and Cross join Merwin at the rear of their home, where a big auto is waiting. Kelly knocks in vain at the front door, then bursts it open and searches the house. He finds no one within and goes out the back way just as the auto is about to leave with Flora, Merwin, Gross and the chauffeur. Kelly jumps for the moving machine and manages to hang on to the cover rods. Holt, having told the grand jurors that he is going on a vacation, appears in a big white car at the forks of the country boulevard. Cross and Kelly, the former in the black auto, the latter on the running board, have a desperate struggle. Finally Kelly is hurled from the machine with a lap-robe wound around his head. At the forks, Flora, Cross, Merwin and the chauffeur quickly transfer to Holt's car and speed off. When Kelly gets his head free and limps to the forks, he finds only the empty black auto. Discouraged, Kelly gives up and returns to the city. At the railroad station, Glover, tired of waiting, opens the trunk on the taxi and finds within the fellow detective, Daniels, bound and gagged. Even the taxi driver escapes. Two months later, the grand jurors receive a letter from Holt, dated Florence, Italy, explaining that he had married Flora before the indictment, that she is innocent, having shielded the real embezzler, her sick father, who had just died. The letter also contains Merwin's signed confession and a check to cover the shortage in the tax collector's office.

HE NEVER FOUND OUT (May 2).—Carl Boardman is a domestic tyrant and Bess, his pretty little wife, cannot keep a girl. She appeals to her mother for aid and mother, who is an actress, writes that the season is just closing and she will come down and straighten things out. Mother arrives and makes herself up like an Irish servant girl. She prepares dinner and when Carl returns he has a dinner that calls for a kick. Carl says that he will fire this one and make it the even ten he has fired this month. The Irish girl is not so easy to fire, and Carl gets very much the worst of it. Mother runs up stairs, changes to her proper self, and rings the door bell, being introduced to Carl as just having arrived. She volunteers to fire the cook and goes out into the kitchen and makes a terrible row. Carl is certain she is being killed, but mother strolls in dusting off her fingers, and Carl becomes her abject slave.

THE SCAR.—(April 20).—Out to investigate graft charges against the politician, the newspaper woman confronted his Italian wife. "You, the woman always following my husband," the wife cried. In the conflict that followed the scar came. Separate and alone in the passing years the wife thought only of the scar and the other woman. The cloud was lifted by her son, now grown.

BRUTE FORCE (2 parts—April 25).—The imminent struggle between brute force and brains has always resulted in victory for brains as this story of primitive days attempts to portray. The young man dreams he is the primitive leader of the stone club men. His tribe eventually faces annihilation at the hands of the bow cave men who have found the secret of his power, the stone club. It is then that the inventive brain is stimulated and gives birth to a new idea.

A MAN IN THE HOUSE (April 23).—Bunty leaves for abroad. His wife, unknown to him, decides to rent their home, furnished, to the Newlyweds. Bunty receives a wire from his firm, saying the trip is unnecessary. He returns without informing Mrs. Bunty. Mrs. Newbride is alone in the house. Horrors!

THE TANGO FLAT (April 23).—Distracted by the noise of the noisy family above, the Browsers move into another flat. Their anticipated relief is speedily shaken. Tango dancing from the family above, below, across the hall, the janitor and cook takes the place of squalling babies. Poor Browser, driven from room to room in despair, is at last confronted by his wife practising the tango to the music of a new record. The sway of the tango claims another victim.

ALONG CAME A CITY CHAP (April 27).—Our honest country lover was not like the hero in her book. That's why she threw him down. Then came the villain playing on her romantic soul with his evil genii in tow. Many were the cast-off ladies that sought the villain, and the romantic soul of the country lass received a rude jolt. But our honest country lover was on the job at the bridge when the villain cried "Marry me or die."

HOP-HEAD'S DREAM (April 27).—Ever hear of Hop-Head, the dope? He's the wicked guy that we read so much about with his poison needle. The Purity League wanted to reform him. Hop-Head wouldn't stand for that until he got in bad with the king of the dopes. Then Hop-Head had a dream. He became king, but the sponsors of the law got on his trail. Hop-Head sought the purity of the Purity League.

THE SOUL OF THE DESERT (April 30).—To the boy and girl at the beginning of life, love and friends meant more than wealth, but the uncle, his duty done after warning them of the penalty, appropriated the estate for himself. On the way over the desert, back to their mountain home, the exhausted boy and girl met the outcasts. Unlike the self-centered uncle, they sacrificed their all that young lives must live.

HER BIG SCOOP (May 2).—Shortly after the senator received the nomination for governor, the shyster lawyer offering graft appeared. He could give proof to the senator's enemies that his wife's father died in the electric chair. Would the senator come to terms? The "grafter" faced the wrong man. The senator's wife, however, silenced the voice of scandal. Fortune and the press were with her.

ECLECTIC

PERILS OF PAULINE (First Episode).—Stanford Marvin, a rich retired manufacturer, has a son, Harry, and also an adopted daughter, Pauline. Harry is in love with Pauline and Pauline likes Harry very very much. Old Mr Marvin, who feels his health failing, asks Pauline to marry Harry at once, so that he may see them happy and see her provided for in case anything should happen to him. Pauline, although admitting that she loves Harry, says that she will not marry him for a year or two at least, until she has satisfied her ambition to become a great writer. She proves that she has some talent by showing Harry and his father a story written by herself, which has appeared in one of the magazines.

Mr. Marvin recognizes her talent and agrees to send her on a year's trip around the world, in order that she may see life and be able to write better. Mr. Marvin has had a hobby for collecting antiques, and among his other treasures is a mummy. Just after his decision to give Pauline her trip, he is sitting in the library when he is attacked by one of his fainting spells. While in a semi-unconscious state, the mummy steps down from her case and addresses him. This causes an attack of heart failure, resulting in his death. His will, when read, leaves one-half of his fortune to his son and the other half to his adopted daughter, Pauline, with a provision that in case of her death before she marries Harry her share will go to his secretary, Owen. Owen is a villain at heart and plots to secure Pauline's fortune for himself. How these plots are laid, how they are carried out and Harry's share in protecting Pauline is shown on the screen in the different episodes of the story. Owen is a very remarkable vallain and leads Pauline into a series of the most thrilling adventures. Harry, as Pauline's self appointed protector, is kept a very busy man.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE.—In the second episode of "The Perils of Pauline," Hicks, the tough man, and Owen, the secretary, try to find some way in which to cause Pauline's permanent injury or death. While they are talking, Hicks notices in the paper the announcement of an aviation meet in which some of the aviators will carry passengers.

Immediately he gets an idea and proposes to Owen that he persuade Pauline to try an airship flight at the race. Owen persuades Pauline. In spite of Harry's protests to undertake the adventure and after having made arrangements with one of the operators, Owen sneaks into the hangar and tampers with the machine in such a way that an accident is assured.

On the morning of the race Harry tries in every way to persuade Pauline not to go and, finding it useless, puts the big touring car out of business so that it will be necessary for Pauline to ride with him in his runabout.

Before starting, he punches a hole in the gasoline tank and when only about half way to the meet they are stalled. Owen, having reached the field, is very much annoyed at the delay and finally hires an automobile to go out and meet Pauline and Harry. He discovers them on the road and taking Pauline into his car he hurries her to the field. They, however, do not arrive in time, as the aviator with whom they have made arrangements has already started.

The pictures here show the airship coming towards the finish line when suddenly it crumples up and falls to the ground.

Harry, who has arrived at the field and has discovered that all of the operators took up passengers with them and that one took up a lady, is in terror, especially when some of the spectators tell him that the machine to which the accident has just happened is the one carrying the lady.

He, however, soon discovers Pauline in the crowd and learns that they did not arrive in time.

PERILS OF PAULINE (Third Episode).—In the third installment of "The Perils of Pauline" we see Owen bitterly disappointed at his failure to injure Pauline in the airship accident, plotting with Hicks, in whose power he is. They decide that they must lure Pauline away from her home or from the influence of Harry, if they are to be successful with their plans. They finally locate an old sailor who agrees to tell Pauline a history of his life. They persuade Pauline to listen to this and the old sailor tells the most blood-curdling stories of his life on a piratical treasure-laden ship on which he sailed as a boy. The pirate leads Pauline to believe that the ship was wrecked, but that he escaped ashore with the treasure and buried it on an uninhabited island. Fearing to tell his rescuers of the treasure, it is laying buried all these years.

Pauline falls for the story and agrees to fit out an expedition to help the old sailor to recover the treasure. Harry tries to persuade her not to take the trip, stating that he distrusts Owen. Pauline, however, having perfect confidence in Owen, defends him and the two lovers have a serious quarrel, which results in Pauline refusing Harry to accompany her. Harry, however, disguises himself as an old man and on board the liner in the presence of the three conspirators, warns her to have nothing to do with them. They do not suspect his identity, but fearing that his influence may persuade Pauline not to carry out her purpose, they decide to do away with the old man. They do not succeed, but their efforts afford a very spectacular dramatic episode.

He proposes, but she refuses until he is able to buy her a diamond engagement ring. Charlie incidentally owes for a couple of weeks' board. He owns, however, a health insurance policy and decides to try to realize on it. He goes into the street and immediately a stray dog bangs on to his trousers. Charlie runs into the house, and finally breaks loose. The dog then satisfies his anger on the rest of the boarders. Charlie pretends to have hydrophobia. A physician is called, who diagnoses the case as one of acute hydrophobia. Charlie is locked in his room. He breaks loose and causes a commotion at the supper table. A general fight results among the boarders. Finally Charlie tells Vivian what his plan is in pretending to have hydrophia, and has her write the insurance company to send the money. They are non-plussed when they received the company's answer that hydrophobia is the one disease that they do not insure against. The windup of it is that Vivian, convinced that Charlie will never have money, has him thrown out of the house.

NESTOR

WOMEN AND ROSES (April 29).—"And which of these roses three is the dearest rose to me?" Wallace's mother is the faded rose, his wife the pink rose and his mistress the red rose. Wallace is newly married. His wife, as a prospective mother, loses her charm for him and he turns to a mistress. His wife has no suspicion of his deception. But his mother knows. She goes to the mistress and appeals to her to abandon her son and discourage his illicit love affair. But the mistress is cynical about such matters and the mother's sincerity bores her.

An appeal for at least fair play strikes a response in the mistress and she accompanies the mother to her son's home. She allows the mistress to peep through some portieres, on the other side of which the wife is at work upon baby clothes. A strange new note—something she has never felt before—is struck in the mistress' heart. That night she calls an old admirer to her home. Wallace enters and sees her accepting the caresses of his rival in her affections. He upbraids her and leaves, but he does not see that he is guilty of the same perfidy for which he despises his mistress. Howbeit, he is cured and he returns to his wife—the pink rose.

HER HUSBANDS (May 1).—Mrs. Smith inquires from an attorney if he has a clerk who is single, to pose as her husband. Eddie is assigned. He accompanies Mrs. Smith to the seaside, only to fall madly in love with Victoria, a pretty young woman who is at the beach with her mother. However, when Victoria discovers that Eddie is married, what she tells him causes him to smile on the wrong side of his face. He denies it, but the hotel register speaks stronger than his protests. At the height of Eddie's misery a new misfortune threatens him. Mr. Smith, the steeped-in-the-blood Westerner, arrives at the hotel in search of his wife and intent upon killing a certain young man who is posing as her husband. Eddie gets one good look at Smith and beats it. He is saved through the intercession of Mrs. Smith. Victoria forgives him.

TEMPER VS. TEMPER (April 27).—Ethel is a spoilt, high-spirited society girl with a fiery temper. She is wooed and wed by Horace Gray, a wealthy young doctor. After marriage she leads him a merry dance he finds it impossible to curb her temper. He tries by kindly methods without avail. At last he consults a specialist, who advises him to treat his young wife with the same tactics that she has been pursuing. He does so. Ethel is alarmed and in her turn consults the specialist regarding Horace. The specialist tells her that Horace is an extreme and that he must never be thwarted in any way, but must be catered to. Ethel becomes immediately a devoted wife, lending every effort to satisfy the whims of her stricken husband. Horace, under this care, gets rid of his ailment.

THROUGH THE EYES OF THE BLIND (2 parts—April 30).—Irving, a wealthy young artist, goes blind, a happening that puts off his engagement to Ethel. Crushed, Irving leaves her and seeks another city.

Meantime we are introduced to Daisy Dean and her brother. Daisy has been betrayed by a young rounder, Hurst, who refuses to marry her. Daisy's brother, learning of it, asks for his name, threatening to kill him. Daisy leaves her brother to bury herself in another city. The brother later discovers a letter from Hurst which discloses his address. He starts out to visit him. Going back to Irving, we find him living alone; he is in the habit of walking every evening the end of the road outside his house and back again. Some newsboys knock him one afternoon and when he recovers he has lost his location. Believing, however, that he is going in the right direction, he comes to a house and enters. In the room of death, with the murderer at hand, Irving realizes his mistake. Hurst, in a fight with the brother, has killed him. When Irving again finds himself on the street, he tells a policeman that a crime has been committed; but he is unable to say where.

Irving is helped home. Next morning the body of a strange man is found in the woods. The police remember Irving's statement, but are unable to solve the mystery of the murder. Later, Hurst meets Irving and cultivates his friendship. Hurst becomes a constant visitor at Irving's house and they play chess together. Ethel has heard of her sweetheart's blindness and taking a house near him, visits him often. She engages a doctor and he says that Irving can be cured by an operation. This is performed, much to the distaste of Hurst. Irving is warned to keep the bandage on his eyes for so many days.

The evening before Irving is to remove the bandage, Hurst calls, partially drunk. He insults Ethel. Irving, hearing her cries, throws off his bandage—he can see. There is a terrific fight, but before it is finished Irving goes into eternal darkness. Later, Daisy returns and finds that her brother is dead. She informs the doctor of her affair with Hurst and he is at once suspected. Irving is brought into the case again; the remainder of the play does with the bringing to justice of Hurst through a series of exciting incidents.

POWERS.

THE TWO GUN MAN (May 1—2 parts).—The story opens in the home of a political boss, tenement house owner and smooth grafter. He has just sanctioned the engagement of his son, Edwin, and his ward, Ethel. The son, instead of holding his father's views, is a champion of the poor. One day the representative of a corporation leaves a check for $1,000 with the father, accompanied by a letter to the effect that $9,000 more is to follow if a certain franchise is furnished. Edwin finds this letter. Thus he comes to know the source of his father's wealth. He determines that the riches obtained by grafting shall be returned to the poor. He removes the money from the safe and gives it to the tenement people.

At another time the father discovers his son in the act of taking money from his strong box. He summons the police and has his son arrested. Ethel explains to the father the use to which the son put the money. He refuses to listen. She leaves the house. For another five years the relentless father pushes his tenants toward the desperate measures which they threatened if the rents are not lowered. Edwin's prison term is now served and he returns to his father only to be repulsed. Edwin obtains a position, but through his father's influence he is discharged. Everything else having failed, Edwin decides to steal what he cannot make honestly.

In the meanwhile, the Italian tenants have decided that the father must die. Luigi is chosen to do away with him. The father becomes a prey to a guilty conscience, and goes to spend the night with a friend. Luigi follows. Edwin has decided to rob the first house he encounters. It happens to be that of the friend's with whom the father is spending the night. Edwin forces open a window and steals in. Peeping between a pair of portieres, he is astounded to behold an Italian holding a stiletto over his father's heart. An instant before the dagger falls, Edwin shoots the would-be assassin in the hand. Edwin seeks his father's promise that he will turn his holdings in the tenants' district over to him. This the father readily does. Father and son are reconciled and forgiveness and happiness result.

THE OLD MAID'S TRIUMPH (April 27).—Three sheet posters of a burlesque show, displaying a bevy of alluring females in all the array (or lack of array) which is customary with all well regulated burlesque shows, precipitated a near-riot in the sedate little village of Bryarville. But for the clever strategy which the maiden ladies of the village devised, much greater damage might have been done the morals of the male population than was occasioned by the sight of the posters.

These maiden ladies of uncertain ages are dreadfully shocked to find the men eagerly viewing the "wicked" posters. A hurried mass meeting is held. They decide on a plan of action against the show and armed with pads of paper, they take stations about the theater entrance and make a list of "the shameless men who attend the Infamous show." Needless to say, the men cannot withstand the fear of publicity and change their minds. The manager of the burlesquers throws up his hands in despair and withdraws to more lucrative fields.

REX.

AN EPISODE (April 30).—Juan, a rich ranchman, loves Carita, the daughter of a neighboring farmer. After courting her for some time she comes to love him. Betty, in whose veins flow none of the hot Spanish blood, is something of an adventuress and she concludes that she will marry Juan for his money. While she is planning to charm him, she likewise falls in love with him.

Betty now begins the intrigue to the end of breaking up the match between Juan and Carita. Carlos, Juan's foreman, is in love with Betty and he proves a willing tool in her hands. Carlos hires a Mexican to hide himself in Carita's room that night with full instructions in what manner to proceed. At midnight Carlos leads Juan to a position from which Carita's window is in plain view. Juan sees the figure of a man emerge from his sweetheart's bedroom. Juan informs Carita the following day that he no longer desires to marry her. Her pride outraged, she leaves Juan forever. And Betty. Juan meets her once again and scorns her as if she were a viper.

JOKER

A NARROW SQUEAK (April 18).—"Suddenly an ear-splitting scream rent the darkness. Once more the ghost of Lady Merle walked abroad." Thus the farmer's wife reads and a tingling chill races up and down her backbone. "The Ghost of Hampton Manor" is a terrific story, and when she finishes reading it her nerves are all a-quiver. Willy Walrus and Hamburger Hank, two hungry knights of the road, have just picked up a daily paper and they, too, experience horrid tremors in their lumbar regions.

The farmer and his wife leave for the theater. When they are nearly there the wife discovers that she has forgotten the tickets. They return. Meantime Walrus and Hank visit the farmer's house, and finding no one at home, enter. The effects of reading the ghost story has not worn off and when they hear an ear-splitting scream (which comes from the sick pig) they become terrified. The pig runs out of the house—a moment later to get stuck in a fence. Hank beats it from the house, but his career is abruptly halted when a clothes line catches him under the chin.

A BOARDER'S MISHAP (April 29).—Green has just arrived in town. He locates a boarding and lodging house. The landlady tells him that when she chooses upon a room for him she will leave

VICTOR.

THE BOLTED DOOR (Three parts—April 13).—Brooke Garriot, a young man of education, is interested in the development of certain mechanical appliances. Natalie Judson, whom he has never met, is young and pretty and highly interested in society. A wealthy old man, related distantly to both of them, dies, leaving a will that gives his fortune to these young people on condition that they marry. The condition is not to their liking, but, through a mutual girl friend, they are brought together and finally persuaded to marry. After marriage each continues life independent of the other. But as time passes, a feeling akin to love springs up between them. However, both are stubborn and self-willed.

Ren De Land is a friend of Natalie's. Natalie receives attention from him; this is the first thing that stirs Garriot to action. However, the girl friend scents the trouble and proceeds to pay attention to Garriot with the hope of stirring Natalie's jealousy. After a series of dramatic, and at times amusing, incidents, she succeeds. Natalie finally decides that she has no mind for losing her husband when her friend tells her to take him or she will. The young couple awaken to a realization of love only to have it shattered and a tragedy threaten through a minor incident. How this is finally corrected—the thrilling climax aboard a private yacht wherein Garriot teaches Ren De Land that it is best to leave other men's wives alone, completes the play.

U. S. GOVERNMENT INSPECTION OF MEAT (April 17).—It was seven years ago that the present law came into effect, requiring veterinary inspectors authorized by the U. S. government, to be stationed in every slaughtering and packing establishment of importance in the country. These experts safeguard the public health by detecting tuberculosis and other diseases in animals and carcasses. But the average person knows little about how this work is carried on. This film goes into practically every detail of the inspection work, from the ante-mortem inspection of cattle to the final packing. One learns how, under this system, the inspector's vision and sense of touch becomes highly trained so that an exceedingly slight variation from the normal in organ or tissue is detected instantly. One is shown the government tag and what to look for when buying meat. The various scenes have been taken in one of the biggest slaughtering and packing establishments in the country.

WHO'S WHO (May 1).—At a country dance given by old man Smith for his daughter, Irene, Harry, a guest, is smitten by her charms. Smith objects to Harry's attentions to his daughter. Harry, as they are planning an elopement, the old man arrives unexpectedly, takes Irene home, and locks her in her room. In the meantime Harry has made arrangements for their marriage at an adjacent town and manages to send her a note by tying it around a stone and throwing it in her window. Unsuspected by her irate father, Irene makes her escape. She goes to the station, but Harry has not yet arrived.

A train pulls in and Harry's twin brother, Dick, who is from his honeymoon with his bride to pay Harry a visit, is mistaken by Irene for Harry. She rushes him on the train, giving him no time for explanation and the train moves off, leaving the bride in hysterics. In her excitement Irene has dropped the letter containing the address of the minister in the adjacent town where she and Harry were to be married. Dick's bride finds the letter, believes that Dick is about to commit bigamy and calls in the aid of the police.

She and the police board the next train just as Harry arrives. The station master tells him Irene has eloped with that woman's husband. Harry phones to Irene's father. In the meantime Dick and Irene arrive at the minister's house. She insists that the minister marry them at once, but Dick tells the minister that she is a lunatic, but they must humor her to gain time. Dick's bride arrives and accuses him of wanting to commit bigamy. She orders Dick's and Irene's arrest. At this critical moment Harry and Irene's father enter and satisfactory explanations are made.

BISON.

DOLORES DE ARADA, LADY OF SORROW (2 parts—April 18).—Dolores, daughter of a wealthy rancher, leaves the convent to marry Don Miguel, a neighbor. Arriving home she meets Square Jack, the sheriff, and is deeply impressed with him. Anticipating his marriage with Dolores, Miguel casts aside Nita, whom he has ruined. Nita, forsaken and shunned, is found by Juan, Dolores' brother, and taken to his home. Before Nita dies she confesses to Dolores that Miguel is the cause of her ruin.

When Miguel calls to court Dolores, she accuses him and drives him from the house with a horse-whip. Juan aids his sister. Miguel swears vengeance against Juan, and that night he sneaks to a window and shoots him. In the meantime an intense love has grown up between Dolores and Square Jack. Jack instigates a hunt for Miguel, but he cannot be found. Tormented by his passion for Dolores, he visits the garden under Dolores' window and finds Square Jack there making love to Dolores. He attempts to enter. His progress is halted by a servant. He kills the servant, but in escaping leaves his handkerchief behind.

The following morning Jack finds the body of the servant and the evidence of Miguel's guilt. He gathers his retainers and goes in search of the murderer. Miguel eludes his pursuers and decides that while his enemies are seeking him he will carry Dolores away. Dolores and her maid are alone when Miguel and his henchmen ride up to the house.

In the meantime a premonition of danger induces Jack and his men to return to Dolores. There is a fierce battle between the forces of Miguel and Jack's men. Jack is victorious and Miguel is held a prisoner to answer for his crimes.

FRONTIER.

CUCKOOVILLE GOES SKATING (April 30).—Fred Jackson, a skate salesman, and his wife land in Cuckooville and size up the town for customers. They see Pretzel standing in front of his store. Fred sends his wife over to buy a pair of skates. Pretzel informs her he has none for sale. When Fred shows Pretzel the skates he has for sale, Pretzel immediately buys a pair, and, running after Fred's wife, sells her the pair. She skates around the village. Soon a skating epidemic hits the town. Business is so good that Fred proposes to Pretzel that they start a skating rink, Pretzel to furnish the money. A rink is started. To bolster up business an exhibition skating contest is given, in which Pretzel does fancy skating.

Money pours in. Pretzel is delighted, but seeing Fred skating with the girl, he decides to make him mind the box office while he skates with her. This suits Fred. While Pretzel skates, Fred fills his pockets from the receipts and giving the girl the signal, prepares a getaway. Fred and his wife jump into an automobile and start for the station, the skaters following. Pretzel overtakes the auto, and, catching Fred, is dragged on by the station as the train pulls in. Fred and his wife rush to the train. Pretzel tries to get to his feet, but the skates keep slipping from under him.

THE RUNAWAY (May 2).—Arthur disapproves of his mother marrying again, but his objections prove futile and she marries Joe. Several months later Arthur learns that his mother is being mistreated. In a fight he seriously wounds his stepfather. Several months pass. Joe recovers from his beating, which has taught him a lesson. Joe wounds and captures one of the rustlers, only to learn that it is his stepson, Arthur. The following day Joe tells his wife that Arthur was the one who saved his cattle from being rusled. Later Arthur, with the assistance of Edythe, does take care of his stepfather's herd.

ECLAIR.

THE SECRET OF THE WELL (3 parts—April 29).—In France the tale opens. A mystifying murder has occurred. The nephews of the murdered man swear to run down the guilty party. Their search takes them to India, where they run into unlooked for and dangerous obstacles. We have the brilliant Oriental fete given in their honor. At this fete an attempt is made on the young Frenchmen's lives through poison. Jean Farades is at last able to write to his nephews from India that he is returning with a fortune. The reception of the letter provokes jealousy between the two brothers, who, hitherto had been on affectionate terms. They erect a wall separating their respective gardens, between which there is a well common to both. One morning a tradesman goes to the well for a bucket of water for his horse. His efforts to draw it up proving futile, he sends a lad down to ascertain the cause. Trembling with fear and excitement, the lad reappears and informs the bystanders that the body of a man lies at the bottom. They notify the Commissary of Police. The two brothers identify the body of their uncle. The magistrate orders their immediate arrest.

Fortunately for the brothers, Jacques Velimay and his friend, Paul Mersains, set to work to solve the mystery. They discover a scrap of paper in the well. It is torn, but they manage to decipher that it is a receipt for securities deposited with a banker named Smithworth, in Calcutta. A telegram is sent to Smithforth for details of Farades' securities.

Climpson, Smithworth's agent in Paris, breaks into Jacques Velimay's house and steals the incriminating document from his desk. Soon after, Velimay receives a telegram from Smithworth, saying that Farades is unknown to him. This coupled with the discovery that his desk has been tampered with, confirms his suspicions and he at once goes off to Calcutta with his friend, Paul. Here, under assumed names, they enter into pseudo negotiations with Smithworth. The banker is, however, on his guard. That night, Smithworth gives a brilliant fete in honor of the two Europeans, and manages to pour the drug into the cups of his guests. Jacques and Paul abstain from drinking. Smithworth falls asleep. The two friends escape and return to the banker's office where they regain possession of the document stolen from Velimay's desk by Climpson.

Smithworth is roused and gives chase in a motor-boat. As soon as he is close enough, he fires upon them; their frail boat is upset and they vanish under the water. The friends, however, manage to swim ashore and return to Paris. The two scoundrels meet in Paris, and go to the trail of the brothers after disguising themselves. Suddenly the court is interrupted by two men. "Stop! Stop! Here are the names of the murderers!" they cry. The two scoundrels try to escape. They are dragged before the magistrate, and Climpson, seeing the game is up, confesses it was he who had strangled Farades, and with the help of Smithworth, had thrown him to the bottom of the well. The two brothers are reconciled after their terrible experience.

HIS SERVANT (May 3).—Robert Williams' firm is in a bad way. He thinks that the bonds of the Moon Valley Land Co. will help them out. But they are pronounced worthless. In the meantime there has been a change and the bonds now have a monetary value unknown to him, but Shark & Co. have received a tip as to the value of the bonds, and in order to get these bonds, they offer $20,000 for same, far below their value. While negotiating with Williams in another room, Williams' servant (Lund) having learned the real value of the bonds, resolves to save his master in spite of himself. He abstracts the bonds and hides them. Williams, not finding the bonds, accuses the servant of having stolen them. Detectives are called in—the servant is handcuffed. But he extinguishes the light, breaks away and escapes, handcuffed. On the road he meets a man in an automobile. He jumps in, throws the man out and proceeds on in the auto to find a friend of his master's, to whom he tells the story. The servant secures the bonds and returns accompanied by the friend. They enter as the crooks (Shark & Co.) are still trying to make some deal, and accuses them. They leave baffled. The servant then hands the bonds to Williams. He thanks him and taking his hand, calls him "friend." The servant replies, "No, I am only your humble servant."

THE MAN WHO CAME BACK (April 21).—Donald Baxter, a young broker, ruined financially and renounced by his shallow financee, Helen Porter, resolves to start life again and "come back." He does so, at the end of five years returning incognito. He purchases his old home, but gives out the impression that it is his valet, Mr. Hawkins, who is the successful "Klondyke Millionaire." His one-time fiancee and her purse-proud mother at once endeavor to cultivate Hawkins whom Baxter prevails upon to enter society, much to his discomfiture.

In the meantime, Baxter, passing as still a poor man, meets and falls in love with pretty Mabelle Arnold, the ward of the Porters. Eventually, the true identities of Hawkins and Baxter are disclosed, causing the haughty Mrs. Porter and her daughter, Helen, much chagrin and the pretty Mabelle much pleasure, as she and Baxter plan to share sorrows and joys.

A FLURRY IN HATS (April 28).—Hattie Hood, seeing an advertisement in a newspaper offering hats at a greatly reduced price, asks her husband, Knox Dunlap, to give her the money to buy one. He refuses. She complains to her father who induces the husband to part with the price. Hattie buys the hat and joyfully exhibits it to her mother who immediately wants one like it, but the father, Capt. Hood, refuses, so Hattie gives Mother Hood her hat. When Knox learns this, he immediately demands his money back, and Capt. Hood reluctantly complies with his request. In the meantime Hattie reads where the ad says, "Hats on Credit." She immediately buys one. Mother Hood regrets taking Hattie's hat and returns it to her by Bridget Stetson the cook.

The mother sees ad offering credit on hats and she also buys a hat. Bridget takes a peep into the hat box when she arrives at Hattie's and covets the hat. She accidentally sees ad offering credit and forthwith sets out to buy a hat like Hattie's. Capt. Hood, sorry at refusing Mother Hood a hat, buys her one. Knox, also repentent, buys a hat for Hattie. Each with a hat, finally arrive at Capt. Hood's home. To the amusement of all they find that all the hats are alike, which is bad enough, but the "last straw" is reached when Bridget marches in to display her "creation," which is precisely like all the others. She is made to retreat and the numerous hats follow after.

MAJESTIC.

THE TIE THAT BINDS (2 parts—April 19).—Biff Hogan, a tough, wins Mollie McIntyre, because he demonstrates his athletic superiority over Larry McGuire, a hard working man. After his marriage, Hogan gets into bad company, breaks into a factory with two comrades, and after a hand to hand fight with the watchman, he is arrested and sent to prison.

In the meantime, his wife obtains a divorce and marries McGuire. Upon his release, Hogan tries to see his child, but is refused permission by McGuire. In revenge he decides to take McGuire's life. Going to the latter's house, he prepares to shoot him, and nearly takes the life of his own child who is sitting in an arm chair and wears McGuire's hat. The shock makes Hogan resolve to lead a better life.

AN UNREDEEMED PLEDGE (April 21).—Crazed by his desire for gold, Davis, a prosperous farmer, neglects his wife and daughter, Mina. They plead with him in vain. He sets out with his faithful collie. His provisions gone, Davis struggles between love for his wife and daughter, and his lust for wealth. Wealth wins. The daughter is married, and she and her mother live in comfort, but long for the husband and father in the gold fields. Davis is taken ill, but his faithful collie brings assistance to him. After he recovers, starvation stares him in the face and he is forced to seek civilization. He is refused a grub stake. The storekeeper takes a fancy to the collie and offers to supply the needed provisions if the dog is given as security. Davis consents.

It is a terrible struggle to tear himself away from the pleading eyes of the dog. His larder replenished, Davis works with renewed vigor, to soon be able to reclaim his dog. He strikes a lead and tunnels into a ridge. Gold he finds at last. He behaves like a man bereft of reason in his mad joy, and his frantic efforts dislodge the roof of the passage he has built and he is buried alive.

Greatly alarmed by the protracted absence of her father, Mina persuades her husband to search for him. Accompanied by the mother, they set out. Arriving in town, Mina's attention is attracted to the dog, who is in the window, by his frantic actions. She recognizes him. They enter, and the dog is reclaimed. Gray suggests that the dog may know the whereabouts of his master and he is released. He darts away. In the auto the others pursue. Along roads and over prairies at racing speed until finally the chase ends at the mouth of the tunnel, where the dog begins digging frantically. Davis is rescued.

On returning consciousness, he seizes in his arms the Unredeemed Pledge, and sobs in its furry coat. There is a happy reunion, but Davis still points proudly to the riches that near cost him his so dear.

PRINCESS.

HER AWAKENING (April 17).—Helen Gray, the daughter of a hard working carpenter, receives the attention of her employer (Mr. Adams), much against her father's will. On her birthday, Mr. Adams invites her to dine with him and presents her with a handsome bracelet.

That night, on Helen's return home, at twelve o'clock, her father, who has waited up for her, upbraids her. She becomes frightened as he threatens to kill Adams and her, if she goes out with him again. Helen, much worried, goes to bed. She dreams she meets Adams and is caught by her father, who takes his revenge on Adams.

Adams dies later and the father is convicted of murder. In the courtroom scene Helen becomes hysterical and pleads for her father's life. She is next shown bidding her father the last farewell before his execution. She screams as they are leading her away and awakens to find it is all a dream. She rushes into her father's room and awakens him by hugging and kissing him. The next morning she returns the bracelet, sends in her resignation to Mr. Adams, and decides to remain at home and keep house for her father.

THANHOUSER.

AN INFANT HEART SNATCHER (April 19).—In a typical New York boarding house the pet of the establishment was the little four-year-old daughter of an actress. In fact, everybody fell under the fascination, except the trio known in the establishment as "the three cross old men." A theatrical engagement took the mother out of town and she left her little girl in the care of the boarding house mistress. Away out on the Pacific coast the mother was taken ill just as her company was stranded and for many weeks was in a hospital penniless and dependent upon charity. She wrote pitiful letters to the boarding housekeeper, but the woman declared she would send the child to an orphan asylum. Strange, to relate, she did not, and the other boarders gave her credit for generosity she did not possess.

In the course of time the mother returned and took her little girl away. Some days later there was great excitement for an attempt was made to kidnap the child, and the kidnappers, strange to relate, were the "three cross old men." They were arraigned in court and the case was going very much against them when the little girl decided it was time to interfere.

She climbed up beside the judge, snuggled on his knee, and told him everybody was making a mistake, that the "three cross old men" were really not cross at all. In fact, they were the best friends she had and during her mother's absence had supplied her with toys and candy and had even paid her board. "The three cross old men" being found out admitted that they loved the child and were brokenhearted when the mother went away. They proposed that the mother establish a boarding house of her own, guaranteeing to make it pay, and the judge let them go. The new boarding house was established, but it did not have any "cross old men" among its patrons—on the contrary they were what the child called "my three grandpas," pleasant, smiling old chaps, who thought the world of the little girl and planned great things for her future.

WHEN ALGY FROZE UP (April 24).—The village banker's wife was ambitious that her daughter should make a notable marriage, and had picked out a young British nobleman whose blood was as blue as his pocket was empty. The girl did not approve of the suitor, but this made no difference to the mother and the father was afraid to interfere.

The mother invited the nobleman to visit them in the country to participate in the joys of "an old-fashioned American winter," and he gladly complied, as it fell in with his plans. The girl, however, failing to move her mother by arguments, decided to resort to strategy. With the aid of a few accomplices, including her father, she gave the nobleman such an unexpectedly lively time that he hated winter and the country. In fact, so strongly did he feel that when the banker consented to the marriage on condition that his son-in-law live with him, the nobleman lost no time starting back for Broadway, where the nice comforts of the country do not exist.

AMERICAN.

HER FIGHTING CHANCE (April 27).—Jim and Edith had made an early marriage. Then followed Jim's fight for literary success. This took his time away from his wife and they became indifferent to each other. Finally, success assured, and his work no longer a struggle, Jim felt the need of a sympathetic woman spirit. But left out of her husband's life by his work, Edith had become a social butterfly. Her husband's position gives her social place and he is able to give her plenty of money. A breach has come into their lives. Their only mutual interest is their children. Finally Jim finds a sympathetic spirit. Out of the hundreds of letters from admiring readers, he finds one that interests him. Nell Dare had long followed his work in the magazines, etc., and discovered that they had mutual aims. Jim's animal stories especially interested her and she finally writes in appreciation of one.

Nell is a young school teacher with literary ambitions. This letter Jim answers and a correspondence is developed. Matters at home reach such a point that Jim is unable to work in that atmosphere of irritation and misunderstanding and establishes a studio. The children are his only touch with his home as they visit him at the studio daily. Jim sells one of Nell's stories for her and the editor agrees with Jim that Nell is going to be a great success. Jim spends his vacation at the farmhouse where Nell boards. Jim forgets that he is not free to love Nell. Nell goes to the city to live. She and Jim are already in love with each other. Nell and Jim realize the hoplessness of their cause and Jim makes a voyage to Africa.

During his absence in Africa Edith and the children are at a summer resort. Nell comes to same hotel. Edith goes driving with a spirited horse which runs away. Nell, riding horseback, goes and saves her. Later Edith writes to thank Nell and the name "Edith Corbin" is Nell's first intimation that she has rescued Jim's wife. Edith seeks Nell out and becomes much attached to her. Nell is rather taken with Edith and she is really lovable. Nell accidentally discovers that Edith has literary ability. Edith tells Nell her husband was always so busy with the work that she never told him she felt that she could write. Nell leaves Edith taking one of Edith's stories with her. She studies it and finds undoubted literary talent. Nell sees that Jim could find his working partner in his own wife if she would develop her talent as he has hers. What shall she do? Help Edith develop her writing and then take her chance for Jim and happiness with her or not? Suddenly she sees Carol and Jim, Jr., playing in the sand below her with their nurse. Little Jim, Jr., points out to sea, telling Carol: "Papa is way out there." The sight of them and her love for them determines her to help Edith with her writing, thereby giving the wife a "fighting chance." They return to the city. Nell neglects her own work to help Edith with her writing. Edith sells several stories, then begins a book. Nell is now sure that Edith will win, as Edith has given up society. Edith's book is a sensation and Nell goes to congratulate her. She decided to go away, leaving a letter telling Jim farewell. Jim returns to America, goes at once to his studio and tries to 'phone Nell. Failing, he finds the letter and his picture. He yields to the inevitable though his heart is breaking. He does not yet know that a different woman waits him in the butterfly wife he left. At the club he receives his first news of Edith's literary work and of her success. Surprised and wondering he goes home. Edith confesses shyly that she is the new "literary star." They go to the bedside of the sleeping Jim, Jr., and Carol. Jim kisses them. Jim understands what Nell meant when she said he could find his happiness at home. He and Edith are reunited. Then we see Nell on train traveling away.

THE SMOULDERING SPARK (April 29).—"A spark of manhood smoulders in them all," so Frederick Miller declares, looking from the luxurious club's window at the unfortunates on the nearby park benches. The other club men scoff, and Miller wagers Duncan that, given a chance, one of those human wrecks will redeem himself. Miller selects Jack Martin, a derelict on life's sea, and gives him a position as butler in his home. Jack's attitude at first is antagonistic, but he begins to change through the kindliness of Miller, his wife, and son Tom, and particularly sweet little Ellen, Miller's seven-year-old daughter.

Tom Miller, through bad association, falls into debt, and Miller angrily refuses him money. Tom rifles his father's safe. Jack sees this and wishing to shield the boy and fearing that shock of the truth would be too great for Miller, he assumes the blame when the theft is discovered. Miller, believing Jack hopeless, sadly dismisses him. A little later Jack finds once more a derelict. As he pauses irresolutely before a saloon, he sees Tom within, drinking with some friends. A brawl starts, in which Tom is hurt. Jack enters, saves Tom from further harm and takes him home. Tom, remorseful, confesses the theft of the money, clearing Jack. Jack is warmly thanked by Miller, and once more welcomed in their home. Miller writes to Duncan saying, "I win the wager. Our derelict not only possessed the smouldering spark, but he has made a man of my son as well."

THE RIGHTFUL HEIR (2 parts—April 24).—Sir Patrick O'Neil has two sons, Phelim, the elder, a spendthrift and gambler; and Lawrence. Phelim discovers the hiding-place of his father's gold and one night attempts to steal some, but is discovered by his father, who strikes him. Phelim becomes the leader of a band of smugglers and hires Redfield, a highwayman, to "silence" Richard, the young son of Lawrence, and Patricia, who, now since the death of Sir Patrick and in the event of the death of Lawrence, would be the only thing to stand in his way to being the lord of Ballyskillen. Redfield hides Richard in a cave from which, unknown to Redfield, he is rescued by Dris-

ADVENTURES OF SHORTY—SHORTY ESCAPES MATRIMONY (First Episode—2 parts—April 29).—While Shorty is out looking for cattle thieves his horse stumbles and falls, and Shorty is thrown and injured. He is captured by a bunch of Mexican Rebel soldiers and put in jail. He is seen by Anita, a beautiful Spanish girl, whom he sends to notify Bud Simms, the ranch owner. Anita has taken a great fancy to Shorty and breaks the rules by taking food to him. In the meantime an important letter has come to the ranch for Shorty. The boys open it and find that Shorty has been left a fortune on condition that he marry a certain woman within two weeks. The boys conceive the plan of marrying Shorty to the lady, who is on her way to the ranch, by proxy. Nell Holden, the lady in question, who is rather a pretty girl, fearing that she may not like the looks of Shorty, disguises herself as an ugly old maid so that Shorty will refuse to marry her. The proxy is Tom Crowne, a very handsome young cowboy, who falls in love with Nell, when he sees her with the disguise removed. Nell plans with the sheriff, who is also the magistrate, to insert Tom Crowne's name in the marriage license instead of Shorty's so that Tom becomes her legal husband instead of only by proxy. Anita notifies Simms of Shorty's whereabouts and the cowboys rescue him. Shorty is very much surprised to find on his return that he has been married by proxy, but is no more surprised than Tom Crowne when he finds that instead of being Nell's husband by proxy, he is really her legal husband.

DOMINO.

A COMMON MISTAKE (2 parts—April 23).—Pierre Jardine does not permit his daughter, Marie, to associate with any of the young folks, and as a result she becomes dissatisfied, so taking a painting of her father and his old time friend, Dr. Jacques René, both at playing chess, she leaves for Paris. The old man is heartbroken and realizes that he has been too strict with her. He goes to Paris to find her.

In the meantime Marie has secured an apartment in the artists' quarters and attempts to finish the picture. Before she has it finished her funds are so diminished that she is unable to buy the material necessary to complete it. Raoul Dante, an artist, who has an apartment adjoining and who is interested in his pretty neighbor, hears her prayer to the Virgin for aid, and during her absence one day, finishes the painting. Marie, on returning home, is astonished and delighted; the old janitor trys to make her think that the Virgin must have done it. Marie sells the picture for a good sum and is happy, although puzzled as to who finished the painting. One day she overhears Raoul and the janitor talking and discovers that it was Raoul who had been so kind to her. She thanks him and later they fall in love. Pierre comes to Paris, sees the picture exhibited in the window, buys it and is just returning home when, in passing a building under construction, a brick falls on him, rendering him unconscious. Raoul, discovering the accident, removes him to his apartment, together with the picture, and then a touching reunion takes place between him and Marie. Pierre consents to have Raoul for his son-in-law.

FEATURE FILM STORIES

UNIVERSAL SPECIAL FEATURES.

THE SPY (Four Parts).—Harvey Birch, the spy, is a member of the household of General Washington, and the action of the story takes place during the first years of the Revolutionary War while the Continental army, under Washington, is encamped near Newburg-on-the-Hudson. In order that the spy may move within the British lines with greater freedom, he has allowed the impression to go out that he is a British spy. Washington alone of the Continental army knows the true state of the spy's allegiance, and he has given Birch a letter signed by himself which Birch is to use only in the direst extremity. This letter sets forth that the bearer is in reality an American spy and that he has deliberately created the impression that he is in the pay of the British. It is signed by the commander-in-chief.

The spy wishes to tell Washington to meet him at the Wharton's house, which is neutral, and has himself arrested as a British spy by Washington's soldiers and is brought before Washington, who says he will question him alone. When he has secured the message, the General tells Birch to make his escape, which he does through the chimney and rides away on the General's horse. When the horse returns, the General knows Birch has made his escape. But Major Dunwoodie, in command of a troop of American soldiers, and in love with Frances Wharton, offers a reward for the capture of the spy. The Skinners, who are a body of irregulars who prey on the defenseless of both sides, attempt to arrest the spy for the reward. They visit his house and after frightening his father and sweetheart, they are put to rout by the spy.

Washington goes to the Wharton home to meet Birch. Captain Wharton, who is an officer in the British army and is about to be sent to England, comes to his home to say good-bye. He is in disguise. Washington recognizes him, but tells him that he is safe on such an errand. The spy comes and gives British plans to Washington, who gives him a false dispatch in case he be arrested.

These intercepted plans cause the British to advance into an ambush over a bridge which has been weakened by the Americans. A battle takes place and the British are defeated. Captain Wharton takes this opportunity to go back to his lines, but is warned by the spy. They are seen, however, and Major Dunwoodie has to arrest the brother of his sweetheart and send him to headquarters for trial for being in disguise in the American lines.

The Skinners burn Birch's house and capture him. He is taken to headquarters and placed in the tavern for safekeeping. The landlady assists him to escape. Birch hears of the arrest of Captain Wharton and resolves to get him away. Disguised as a minister, he goes to his cell and changes clothes with him. He goes to the scaffold to pay his penalty of being a spy, not even then showing the letter which he knows will save his life. But Washington comes up and orders them to search him. The letter is discovered, and the spy is placed in the right light before the world, but his former usefulness is over.

APEX.

A WARDEN'S CRIME (Four Parts).—John Halling, a prison warden, stands in the dock of the crowded court, charged with the crime against the State. The counsel for the defense asks the judge to let the accused tell his own story. The court scene fades away, and we see John Halling kneeling beside his little girl, who is seriously ill, and this is how he tells his story.

"I had no more money left out of my month's salary to buy medicine for my little girl, but my friend and neighbor, Engine Driver Bueller, gave me one dollar out of a dollar and fifty cents, which was all he had. To my dismay the chemist informed me that the medicine was one dollar and fifty cents, and I only had one dollar, but Bueller cheerfully gave me his last cent, and I vowed that I would one day repay his great kindness."

The Judge then asks for the convict Bueller to be brought into the court, and he is asked to tell his story, after the time when he gave Halling his last cent. The court scene again dies away, and Bueller tells his story.

"I gave Halling the last cent I had, and then I went on duty. On my official instructions I was told to pull up at the Junction where the single line commences and to wait the passing of an express. The thought of my neighbor's sick child was in my mind, and I forgot my instructions and dashed headlong into the express. By a miracle I escaped practically unhurt. For three days and nights I wandered about half dazed, but at last I gave myself up. I was sentenced to imprisonment for life, but owing to my good conduct my sentence has been reduced, and I am to be released to-morrow."

Here we see Bueller placed under the charge of John Halling, the warden. One day Halling's daughter informs him that Mrs. Bueller is seriously ill, and when he goes to see her, she cries pitifully for her husband, and the warden tells the convict that his wife is dying. Bueller, mad with anguish, begs the warden to secretly set him free for a few hours to see his wife. The convict reminds him of his promise when he gave him his last cent to buy the medicine for his sick child. At last the warden consents, and the men change clothes. The warden tells the convict to be sure to return before 9 o'clock before the final inspection or it would mean ruination for the warden. The convict dashes off and spends with his wife the last few minutes before she dies. Stunned by the terrible shock he falls across his wife's bed, and when he looks up he finds that it is ten minutes to nine, and it would take him twenty minutes to get back to the prison. He tears madly along the road, over the level crossing, and escapes death by a miracle from a passing express, and when he arrives in the prison cell, the guard of inspection is already there, and John Halling says, "You are one minute too late!" The court scene now comes into prominence again, and the jury retires to consider their verdict. The foreman enters the court, and to the great satisfaction of all present he announces the prisoner "Not Guilty," and so ends the sensational trial of John Halling, prisoner of war, who aided a prisoner to escape in order to comfort his wife in the last minutes of her life.

SHOULD A WOMAN TELL (Four Parts).—Vera, the daughter of Countess Dubowska, feels unhappy in spite of all the luxury that surrounds her. A soiree is held at her mother's house, and Vera sits alone brooding.

Countess Dubowska has arranged to go on a slumming expedition, and she invites Vera to accompany her. They leave their residence and make for the poor quarters, where they dispense their gifts generously. Just as they are leaving, a boy tells them of a poor carpenter lying helpless with a broken arm. They follow him to the carpenter's hut, where Vera dresses his wound and gives him presents of wine and food. Max thanks them, and Vera feels gratified. They return home, and Vera sitting amid beautiful surroundings, reflects upon what she had seen that day, and decides to devote her life to the poor.

Meanwhile, Max cannot forget the way Vera attended him. How was he to ensure her coming again? At last he hits upon an idea, and writes a letter as follows: "Dear Lady: My arm is hurting badly. I think I shall die. Oh, please help me and I shall never forget it. Max Petroff." Congratulating himself, Max then leaves his hut and effects a secret entry into Countess Dubowska's house. He finds Vera's room and creeps in stealthily. Noticing a small table near the window, he places his letter there.

In the morning, Vera notices the letter and she resolves to visit him. All unsuspecting of the way the letter reached her, she sets out to Max's dwelling, taking with her wine and food. Max sees his victim the moment she enters. He rushes to the door and locks it, and attacks unprotected Vera. She is in his power, but an opportunity for revenge occurs when he compels her to hand him the food and drink. Unnoticed, she seizes a chisel, and in self-defense, kills him.

Some time later, Vera visits a fencing academy and attracts Prince Dolsky. The prince declares his love, and Vera, troubled by her conscience, does not accept. But her love for the prince grows stronger, and when he comes to submit his marriage proposal, the vision of the murdered carpenter envelopes the prince's form, and she runs away in a frenzy. After this she becomes very ill, and when convalescent, the prince visits her, and she accepts his offer of marriage.

Many times she is on the verge of making a full confession, but the prince, deeply in love, refuses to listen. The night before the wedding Vera writes a full confession to the prince. But alas! the letter reaches the prince's residence just after he had been suddenly called to his estate. The letter is returned to Vera, and, despairing, she burns it. The next day the wedding takes place, and the couple leave for their new home. But the calls of her conscience become louder, and at the critical moment, Vera relates what happened. The prince is astounded, and orders Vera from the home which she had hardly entered.

Prince Dolsky tries to forget his sorrows by leading a gay life. But a reaction takes place, and he regrets having driven his young wife from him. He engages a detective to search for her so that he may obtain her forgiveness. Meanwhile Vera, under an assumed name, has become a celebrated actress.

One night an old friend induces the prince to go to the opera, where he recognizes his wife as the

THE REDEMPTION OF DAVID CORSON (Four reels).—David Corson, Quaker, recluse and mystic, possessed of strong spiritual powers, walked with God and lived in an ethereal world of purity and sanctity. Guided by heavenly visions, with a power of logic and a beauty of voice and manner capable of swaying the emotions and passions of men, David was a mighty force in the quaint little Quaker community, in which he had spent all his life. Then the woman came—and Satan came also—and David heard the distant voices of the world calling his youth and its idle energies. In a moment of supreme test, he threw his wonderful faith aside, like a discarded garment, and entered the great world that beckoned to him.

Dr. Paracelsus Aesculapius was a traveling quack—a fakir. In his wanderings he had found Pepeeta, a magnetic Spanish beauty, whom a band of Gypsies had stolen as a baby. Paracelsus had bought Pepeeta from the Gypsies, taking her with him as his wife; and Pepeeta was the woman who came into David's quiet life, changing all the course of its destiny.

Passing through David's town, Dr. Paracelsus heard of the young Quaker's wonderful oratorical gifts, and at once realized his value in the selling of fake medicines. The crafty doctor lured David with fabulous promises of wealth and pleasure. But, meantime, Pepeeta and David had looked into each other's eyes—and so David consented to go with the doctor.

Gradually, the love between David and Pepeeta exceeded human bounds, escaped beyond their control, and they followed the trail of the serpent. David urged her to flee with him, and the woman heeded and went with him to distant parts. The doctor followed them with furious vindictiveness, overtook them, and in a fierce struggle was left by David for dead. Tortured by the memory of having murdered the man who had befriended him, struggling against overwhelming elemental passions, David now cast all restraint aside and loosened the flood-gates of vice and depravity. He became a drunkard and a gambler, and descended into the dregs. The gentle Pepeeta, who had watched his degeneration with a breaking heart, could no longer tolerate him, and she left. In his desperate weakness, seeing the woman for whom he had risked his soul drift from him, and about to sink into the abyss of sin and shame, with the waters of oblivion ready to engulf him—it was then that he met the doctor, blind, old and weak, and living only for vengeance. The sight of the doctor was the turning point in David's downward career; it restored his normal balance; it offered a chance for expiation and restitution. He told the doctor who he was, and with a wild fury the blind Paracelsus, grasping a knife from beneath his tattered clothes, struck at David. In a scene of terrific repression, David waited for the impending blow, making no effort to escape or overcome his weak antagonist. The doctor's thrust missed and he fell to the floor, where a moment later he died. David's escape from the pursuing Nemesis nerved him to a final and sublime rally, and, guided by the Divine light, he found the harbor of peace, a storm-racked soul, but with the victorious spirit in command. He sought Pepeeta, and, purified and redeemed, he found in the woman he sought to destroy a strong spiritual ally and an inspiring factor in his final regeneration.

THE CRYSTAL BALL (Three Parts).—When Henry Howland, the great philanthropist, feels his health failing, he makes his will and entrusts it to his nephew, Walter, to file away in his private safe. Impelled by curiosity, Walter opens the will and discovers that his uncle has cut him off with a mere pittance, leaving the major portion of his estate to charity. He cleverly forges a new clause to the will, and is in the act of substituting it for the original when surprised by his uncle. After a heated argument, Howland dies of heart failure and Walter, panic-stricken, carries him to his own room and notifies the coroner.

Later, Walter accompanies Gladys Brooks, with whom he is in love, to the retreat of a Hindoo mystic—a crystal gazer, who bares Walter's life while in a mesmeric trance. Fearful of arrest, Walter escapes from the room and eludes the detectives put on his tracks by the district attorney, who is a rival suitor for the hand of Gladys. After a time he returns and makes a clean breast of the whole affair. The district attorney seeing that Gladys loves Walter, and that Walter is sincere in his desire to start life anew, calls off his detectives and allows the couple to catch the Montreal express.

UNDER THE MASK OF HONESTY (Three Parts).—When Robert, the son of a wealthy banker, meets a young woman on the tennis courts of the Grand Hotel, and is first at her side when she trips and sprains her ankle, he does the most natural thing a young bachelor could do—falls in love with her. It is well known to the police that Robert's father is in league with a desperate band of crooks, captained by the Jack of Spades, but they have never been able to get sufficient evidence for his arrest and conviction.

Into his father's home, furnished with ill-gotten gains, Robert brings his charming young bride. Shortly afterwards he leaves for the African diamond fields to superintend the construction of a new railroad. Robert's father dies of apoplexy and Hesperia takes charge of the bank's affairs. The Jack of Spades calls upon her and demands that she continue negotiations with him. From this time on exciting events are reeled off with rapidity, poor Hesperia, determined to save the good name of her husband, Robert, and the rather soiled reputation of her dead father-in-liaw, meets the Jack of Spades and submits to his blackmailing demands. Robert returns from Africa and finding his wife acting strangely, follows and confronts her in the secret rendezvous where she has gone to confer with the Jack of Spades. In a tragic scene, after the desperado has explained matters satisfactorily, Robert forgives Hesperia, and ceding the tainted money to the Jack of Spades, leaves with her for South Africa to start life anew.

TRACKED ACROSS THE DESERT (Three Parts).—Between Marney and the huge sum of money he coveted stood his niece, Ida. He resolved at all costs to obtain the money. It was essential to the gratification of his pleasure-loving tastes; to the maintenance of his position in society. Besides, he was ambitious; he yearned to enter politics and become noted. By her physician's advice Ida, for the benefit of her health, undertook a trip to Algeria. Her uncle, Marney, formed one of the party. There were agreeable times on shipboard, crossing the Mediterranean, until Marney began his villainy. He disguised himself; drugged his niece; placed her, as he thought, in an extemporized coffin and threw her body into the sea. But he threw the wrong box over shipboard, and the girl escaped.

Undismayed, Marney made another attempt to remove his niece. He suspended a heavy weight in the rigging under which she sat on deck, calculating that when the weight dropped it would fall on her head and kill her. The weight dropped harmlessly on the deck, and again she escaped. Arrived in Algeria, Marney bribed a party of Arabs to abduct Ida and kill her. Death by strangulation seemed to be her fate. Her apparently lifeless body was flung over the cliffs. But once more she escaped. A friendly Arab came to her rescue, and in violation of his oath to his tribe, saved her life and escorted her to a place of safety. Meanwhile, the news of her reported death reached her parents at home. They were grief-stricken. Marney also returned home, and being the next heir made legal claim to Ida's money. He had his hand on the documents which placed him in possession of the long-coveted wealth, when in the nick of time Ida appeared to foil him and hand him over to justice.

GOTHAM FILM CO.

THE LIFE OF "BIG TIM" SULLIVAN (Four Parts).—All of the wonderful stories of life that are told of New York's great lower East Side teem with perseverance, tact and hardship, but, strange to say, most of the men who saw the light of day and their early struggles down in that seething maelstrom of existence have left their earlier associations behind them when success crowned their efforts. They went up into the more refined strata of metropolitan activities and looked back upon the Bowery as something to be remembered with a shudder, but with Big Tim Sullivan it was different, and we show in this picture the wonderful career of the man who sprang from poverty to great wealth and power, but whose proudest boast was the sobriquet of "The Bowery Senator." With enough romance interwoven to give play to a number of old-time characters, we show the barefooted newsboy at school and how he earned the nickname of "Dry Dollar Tim." The fates must have guarded him in his early days because he looked to forgive in his later years the men who antagonized him and placed obstacles in his path when he was a youth. We show Tim when in the admiration of that powerful old organization, "The Whyo Club"; it may truly be said that he won his first nomination with his fists and as soon as he reached his first office as Member of Assembly he began to build a perpetual monument of greater hearts and thankful souls. When the Bowery was flooded with the human wrecks of the great city, Big Tim reached their hearts like a man who knows them—through their stomachs. As his power grew and his constituents gave him higher office he remained a man of his people and never turned his face from an enemy or his back on a friend. When they came to Big Tim for help there were no explanations necessary. His big kind eyes would look into their very souls and in a moment he would know that by helping the applicant he is casting bread upon the waters. Whether it was to relieve the financial stress or to save a loved one from being cast into prison or to secure for a struggler a permit that would mean earning a living, Big Tim was always ready to stop the wheels of state and do the request of his people. In this way he built up a constituency that will forever in political annals stand separate and apart from the general meaning of the term. His supporters would gladly give their lives if it would help Big Tim, but all he ever allowed them to give him was the vote on election day. We show here an oldtime election and how Tim came up in the political world by giving back to his people the good that the world had brought him through their support. In the course of the story, he starts a young man off on the ground of success and he meets in later life the baretoot boy for whom he sacrificed his own comfort when they were both selling newspapers on the streets of New York. The narrative takes the spectator through a series of situations that are unique and interesting as memories of a forgotten day and when we come to the present day we find Big Tim in full power. In the midst of a grand ball given in his honor he stops to help from his pocket a poor unfortunate who knew that in his necessity he would call upon "The Big Fellow," as he was affectionately known under any circumstances.

With various ways the production brings forth and lays open a great heart of this born leader of men. In fact, Big Tim's charity became an institution and to this day it is carried on as he willed when he met his untimely and ignominious end. Every Christmas the flotsam and jetsam of the dark alleys of Chinatown and the Bowery gathers at the headquarters of Timothy D. Sullivan Association for its only square meal of the year. Here, these poor unfortunates forget for the brief hour their days and nights of hunger and anguish. They eat to their hearts content, for nothing is too good for "Big Tim's Boys" and, when they leave the festal board, tickets are handed them which entitle them to another visit at the Club's headquarters in February and there, from the coldest of winter days when you are satisfied to listen to the howling of the wind from the snugness of your fireplace or steam-heated apartment, the human wrecks of New York City give thanks and pray for the peace of Big Tim's soul because he gives them each a pair of warm socks and shoes that will keep the frost from their aching, weary feet.

FORGIVEN; or THE JACK OF DIAMONDS (Six Parts).—While on a Winter's trip in Florida, sailing on the St. John River, John Diamond with the sobriquet of the Jack of Diamonds, has as a traveling companion Daniel Peabody, known as Denver Dan, a type of the old-time Western gentleman gambler. Jack discovers some card sharks cheating Willard Graham. Taking a hand in the game, he wins back and returns to Graham his money. Annie Dennison and her Aunt Cordelia are on a southern trip. Willard Graham is a suitor for Annie's hand. Jack becomes the hero of the trip by heroically plunging overboard and saving a little child, Virginia Bell. This attracts Annie's attention to Jack.

Later at St. Augustine Jack and Annie see much of each other to the chagrin of Graham and Aunt Cordelia, who does not like Jack, and who constantly snubs Denver Dan, who tries to win her love. Graham receives a letter from Texas, warning him to look out for Frank Popham. Some years before, Graham, while a guest at Popham's house, had robbed Popham of his wife and then cast her aside. Popham, who has become a derelict, sees Graham in the park of the hotel with Annie and tries to stab him. Graham overpowers Popham and gives him money to return to Texas, pretending to Popham that his wife still lives. Graham sends a note to Annie that her lover is the notorious Jack O'Diamonds. This is a shock to Annie, but Jack begs of her to hear his story. Jack recites, and in a dissolve we see how his parents lost their fortune in a Wall street panic. Jack is lucky at cards and becomes wealthy. He promises that if Annie will marry him he will swear off gambling forever. Annie accepts.

Seven years later Jack is at home in Jacksonville, and they are blessed with a daughter, Leonie. Fortune, however, has been against him, but he steadily holds to his promise not to gamble. Graham has been a frequent visitor, awaiting the chance to ruin Jack. This he does by exposing him to the head of the railroad company, of which Jack is an employee, as the former notorious gambler, Jack O'Diamonds. Jack is discharged. He raises financial aid from Graham and Denver Dan, and secures a job as night watchman, but is ashamed to tell Annie. Receiving an offer to go into the cattle business in Texas, Jack starts from home, but misses his train. Graham, meanwhile, has told Annie that Jack has gambled each night, and persuades Annie to go with him and he will prove this. As they are about to leave, Jack returns and, believing that Annie is faithless, draws his pistol to shoot Graham, but decides to give him his life and Graham departs. Jack goes upstairs while Annie takes Leonie and leaves. Ten years later Jack is wealthy and owns a cattle ranch in Texas, and has Denver Dan as his companion. When on their way with cattle to Santa Clara, Jack saves a young woman from an attack of a Mexican named Pedro, though he fails to recognize that she is his daughter.

Pedro is sent from the village store with a package to the school teacher, Leonie's mother. Stopping at his shack on the way, he, while eating, reads a newspaper personal, offering a reward for information about Mrs. Annie Drummond and signed by Wallard Graham, of Jacksonville. Noticing the same name on the package, he inquires when delivering the package to Annie if she is not the Mrs. Annie Drummond of Jacksonville. Seeing her recoil from the query, Pedro writes to Graham that the one he advertises for is at Santa Clara. When Graham receives this letter he departs for Santa Clara at once. Jack and Dan, while at the Santa Clara Hotel, meet Popham, who is an outcast and wreck. Jack gives him money after hearing his story of how Graham had ruined Popham's life and home.

Graham arrives at Santa Clara some time later, and meets Pedro. He leaves hotel for Pedro's shack and is followed by Popham, who recognizes Graham at the hotel. He follows and tries to stab Graham at Pedro's shack, but the Mexican intervenes and assaults Popham, who staggers into a settler's cabin exhausted. Graham calls upon Annie at her home, and she is frightened on seeing him.

Jack, when making a second trip to town, again ask Leonie, who has taken Jack's former house, Jack is surprised when she says her name is Leonie Diamond, and he then recognizes her as his daughter. Leonie brings him to the gate of her home and enters the house to tell her mother how she was saved and to come out and meet her rescuer. Graham is still in the parlor. There is mutual recognition, but Jack bobs the loving advances on his wife in abeyance. Half crazed at Jack's treatment, and that Graham is in the house, she entreats Jack to come back at evening when she will prove her innocence. Jack joins Dan and goes to the hotel. Annie then orders Graham out of the house. He goes, but says he will return again. Jack and Graham reach the house late that afternoon at the same time; they draw their guns to shoot each other. Denver Dan interposes. Jack challenges Graham to a duel at sunset. Graham arranges with Pedro to stab Jack on the duelling ground. Denver Dan goes to Annie's home and demands that she stop the duel. Annie sees Jack at the hotel, but Jack will not agree to stop the fight. Dan is left alone with Aunt Cordelia, and gets her consent to wed. Graham and Pedro on the way to the duel pass the settler's cabin, when Popham, near death, sees Graham, struggles from the couch, takes shot gun from the wall and follows Graham and Pedro. Annie arrives home distracted, and leaves with Dan and Cordelia for the scene of the duel. Jack has proceeded there, meets Graham and they pace off to turn and fire. Pedro is seen sneaking up to stab Jack in the back. Denver Dan arrives at the duelling grounds at this time, sees Pedro and draws revolver and shoots the Mexican in the wrist. Popham is then seen dragging shot gun through the brush. Jack turns when hearing the sound of Denver Dan's gun, and as he does, Graham starts to fire at Jack. Popham fires and hits Graham. Before dying, Graham confesses that Annie is innocent and Annie is forgiven by Jack.

SOLAX.

A FIGHT FOR FREEDOM; or EXILED TO SIBERIA (Four parts).—Slowly and painfully a long line of suffering political prisoners were being brutally driven through the blinding snow to the barren wastes of Siberia, where they were destined to spend the balance of their lives in toil and sorrow. At the rear of the line patiently trudged a feeble old man, who in spite of his advanced years had brought the cruel vengeance of Russia down upon his head by daring to speak his mind in the interests of freedom.

In the distance could be seen a small sleigh driven by an aged woman at whose side sat a strikingly beautiful girl. They were the wife and daughter of the exile, who were sharing his sad lot. In the camp of the prisoners they were allowed to live in a small hut, where they tried in vain to make the father comfortable, and soon realized that unless he could be taken back to civilization he would surely die.

They sawed a hole in the floor of their hut and placed a trunk with a movable bottom over it. Then placing the old man beneath the floor they put some of his clothes and a note telling of his suicide on the river bank and waited. For weeks they fed and cared for him secretly while the officials thought him dead. Finally they were given passports and told to return to Russia. The trunk was searched and found to contain clothes, but it was no sooner locked than the exile dropped the clothes into the cellar, and taking their place, was safely on his way across the border.

In Russia, General Romanoff had ordered a massacre and his son had been stripped of his uniform for refusing to carry out the general's orders to slay the innocent. Sadly he left his father's house resolved never to return. On the road he met the exile, whose sleigh had been overturned and while helping him, fell under the spell of the large serious eyes of his beautiful daughter. Together they joined a revolutionary society, and when lots were drawn to destroy General Romanoff, the girl found herself called upon to do the dangerous work. Not knowing that the general was the father of her gallant lover, and embittered by her own father's death she consented.

A bronze statue was presented to the general, who received it as a token of appreciation of his work, little dreaming that it contained the girl who was bent upon his destruction. But her lover had decided to save his father and the girl at all costs, and the deed was prevented at the very last moment with the general still innocent of his near approach to death. Mourning his son, the general wrote him a letter of forgiveness, but tore it to bits when he learned of his application to the revolutionists. Likewise the son wrote his father begging forgiveness, but destroyed the letter when the general ordered a new massacre.

A terrific battle was fought in the streets, the father leading his troops in person against the forces of his son. In the thick of the fight the general, seriously wounded, experienced a strange realization of the equality of man as he gave his last drink of water to a common revolutionary soldier and clasped his hand in brotherly love ere his soul had fled. So the general's son and the exile's daughter found the two old soldiers peacefully sleeping in each other's arms and their grief was tempered by the mute evidence of the general's change of heart as they smiled tenderly through their tears.

ECLECTIC

JEALOUSY (Four parts—April 20).—Jules Leroux, a wealthy banker, lived in Paris with his three daughters, Alice, Jeanne, and Helen. Alice was engaged to be married to Robert Durand, but owing to her father losing most of his money in a bank failure, her fiance broke the engagement. Leroux was compelled to retire to his country estate, where he took up his residence with the three girls.

One day, while Helen was on a jaunt on horseback, she encountered the Marquis de la Tour, who was smitten by her beauty. He sought an introduction to her and after a short courtship, succeeded in winning her. Helen's good fortune only served to arouse pangs of jealousy in her sister, Alice, who had been jilted. About this time a young nobleman, Raoul de Gordes, became a frequent visitor at Leroux's home and paid homage to the unmarried sisters, Jeanne and Alice. But the former's charms gradually won him and he fell a victim to Cupid's wiles. His suit being favored by Jeanne, he wrote to her father, asking his consent to their marriage. But as his letter failed to state which sister he meant, Leroux assumed it to be Alice, who was the elder, and accordingly showed her the letter and offered her his blessing. Consternation reigned, however, when De Gordes arrived and stated that it was Jeanne to whom his attentions were directed. Then was Alice enraged indeed, and secretly vowed vengeance.

When Jeanne and her husband returned from their honeymoon, it chanced that Leroux was suddenly called back to Paris. He requested Jeanne to consent to having Alice live with her till his return, which she eagerly agreed to. When Alice arrived, she was given a hearty greeting. While passing through the conservatory Jeanne's husband pointed out to the sisters a poisonous tree, whose sap was considered very deadly. Alice took a peculiar interest in the tree. Soon after this Jeanne was suddenly stricken with a mysterious malady and in spite of all the doctor's efforts, she slowly became worse.

While in the gardens one day, De Gordes saw Alice cautiously enter the conservatory and followed her. Watching, he saw her extract some juice from the poison tree and suddenly realized her intentions. He confided his suspicions to her father and the doctor and they determined to catch her at her nefarious work. When they accused her of evil intentions, she laughed at their accusations and drank the contents of a small phial which she had, to prove her innocence. This seemed to satisfy them and she passed into another room. But the deadly poison, which she had taken, began to take effect. She wrote her confession and sent a servant with it to her father. Hastily summoning De Gordes and the doctor, he followed her to the conservatory, but arrived just as she had passed into eternity. The mystery was solved and Jeanne recovered. But she never learned the secret of her sister's tragic death or her own narrow escape.

DR. GOUDRON'S SYSTEM (2 parts).—Brezard, a journalist, is enjoying a well-earned rest when a letter from his manager suddenly recalls him to his professional duties.

My dear Collaborator:—A good article regarding the insane asylum at Berneville will be very acceptable at this time, owing to the appointment of Mr. Maillard, as Director of the institution, to whom this letter will serve you as an introduction. Will you take this up? Yours very sincerely,

L. HOFFMAN.

Mrs. Brezard insists on accompanying her husband to Berneville. As it happens events of the greatest moment are taking place at the asylum on that day. The inmates, who have mutinied, succeed in locking up their keeper and stealthily invade the administration buildings. The director is unable to decide upon the measures to be taken to offset the peril which he suspects is imminent. The madmen, emboldened by the absence of the staff, throw themselves on the director whom they overpower.

While this is going on the journalist and his wife arrive at the gates of the asylum. They are somewhat surprised at not finding anyone at the gates; nevertheless, they advance into the deserted courtyard, and soon arrive at the main building without having met a soul.

In the dispensary adjoining the director's office a savage and horrible scene is taking place. The madmen, surrounding the unfortunate Maillard, enact with a terrible gravity an awful comedy. Two among them who suffer from the monomania of believing themselves doctors and who have taken the names of Dr. Goudron and Prof. Plume, decide to make their victim undergo the frightful operation of the ablation of the eye.

In the meantime the visitors have reached the hall of the administration building. The young man, terrified by the disquieting silence, would like to go away, but the journalist, who has already knocked on the director's door without receiving a reply, decides to enter. Through another door a man has just made entrance into the office. His blanched face, glaring and staring eyes and jerking motions cause the young couple great apprehension. He pretends to be the new director and reads the letter handed to him by the reporter. Dr. Goudron, for it is he, explains to his hearers the particulars of the treatment of which he is the author, certain points of which are most incoherent.

Suddenly a horrible and sickening rattle breaks up the interview. The pseudo-director rushes into the next room and returns a few minutes later, his hands covered with blood. He calms the fears of Brezard, whose self-control is fast fading, and he explains that he has been bitten by a madman, whom alone, he is able to master.

For some little time strange beings have invaded the office. Their attitude is unconscionable, their gestures wild; they observe with the greatest curiosity the visitors. Suddenly loud claps of thunder are heard; a terrific storm is raging. The fury of the elements excites the madmen, who become threatening and prevent the trembling reporter and his wife from leaving the place. The sight of blood, slowly oozing under the door, behind which was heard the agonizing wail, awakens the murderous instincts of the madmen, who throw themselves on Brezard, overpower him, and prepare to make him undergo the frightful operation which they have practiced upon the unfortunate director.

Fortunately the head-keeper has been able to release his colleagues, and they arrive upon the scene just in time to master the madmen, clap on the straitjacket and make them regain their cell. The reporter and his wife are saved from a horrible perspective. Months have elapsed. The young couple, sound both in body and spirit, enjoy life and retain but a hazy recollection of the terrible experience which they underwent at the Berneville Asylum.

CHICOT THE JESTER (Three parts).—Henri is surrounded by fawning courtiers, who hide behind their smiles a deadly intent to do away with him at the first opportunity in favor of his brother, Duc D'Anjou. There is but one man who is honestly Henri's friend. This man is Chicot the Jester—a huge, handsome, fearless fellow, true as steel to those who called him friend, deadly as venom to those who dared betray him or his sovereign, and the only person who may speak the truth to the king.

Chicot the Jester is given an order by the king for the arrest of the gallant Count De Bussy, whose deserved popularity with the ladies of the court irritates the petulant Henri constantly. Chicot the Jester had the courage of his convictions—he was a man who dared. Knowing his friend De Bussy to be guiltless, he tore the Court order into shreds and ordered De Bussy into retirement at the peaceful castle of Baron de Meridor, whose beautiful daughter, Diana Chicot, knew to be the adored one of De Bussy's heart.

How De Bussy complied; how he was waylaid by the king's men within Diana's gates; how Diana nursed him secretly; how the uncouth Count de Monsoreau had the beauty kidnapped upon De Bussy's return to court; how De Monsoreau married her before Chicot—who had overheard the plot—could interfere; all go to make up the most thrilling, most impressively seened and costumed succession of incidents that have ever been contained in a single reel of picture.

The second and third reels show that De Bussy tries to enlist the sympathies of the fickle Henri in his behalf, with Chicot's connivance. Henri, in a fit of pique and to discountenance De Bussy, ignores his pleas and those of the bereaved Father de Meridor for the return of Diana; and to make her marriage a matter of record, beyond preadventure, he permits De Monsoreau to present his new lady to himself—Henri, at court, thus legalizing the marriage absolutely. Chicot, besides the knowledge that his friend De Bussy has been discomfited and the lovely Diana forced to wed against her will by De Monsoreau, has the further incentive to plot the latter's undoing of believing him to be the arch-conspirator against Henri's continuation in power.

While Chicot is gathering evidence of De Monsoreau's treachery to the sovereign, Henri goes into retirement at a monastery over the holy week, attended, among others, by De Monsoreau. Choosing this propitious moment, De Bussy seeks to free Diana from her palace prison; but Monsoreau's unexpected return precipitates a one side duel to the death, for De Bussy is one against Monsoreau and his horde of armed men. Chicot, having proofs of De Monsoreau's perfidy, accompanies the King's soldiers to the plotter's palace, bent upon his arrest. His timely appearance saves De Bussy, who is fast going from loss of blood; and Chicot in order to "save the hangman a needless task," plunges De Monsoreau's sword into its owner's black heart. He then turns to the fainting lovers and announces jovially as though nothing untoward has just taken place. "De Monsoreau is dead; long live De Bussy; Diana is a widow, my boy, take her. I give her to you!" But his own heart breaks, for he, too, loves the Lady Diana.

THE GREAT PYTHON ROBBERY (Four parts).—James Brown, an English crook, wires to his accomplice, Jules Judells, in Paris, telling him to come to London at once. Judells leaves via Calais for Folkestone, but learning he is watched adopts the disguise of an old woman. The Folkestone police are on the watch for Judells, but the disguise baffles them, and the crook successfully joins Brown in London. Brown tells Judells that Madame Pillard, a popular opera singer, is visiting London and propounds a scheme for gaining possession of the prima donna's famous jewels. Together they watch Madame Pillard's arrival at Victoria, and tracing her to her hotel, secure apartments above those taken by the opera singer. With them the crooks take a twelve-foot python, which they intend to use in connection with the prospective robbery.

By means of a mirror on the end of a pole the crooks watch Madame Pillard's movements and selecting a favorable opportunity descend by a rope outside her window. Judells then pushes the python through the curtains, and at the sight of it the maid falls into a faint. Although terror-stricken Madame Pillard strives to reach the telephone, but the snake prevents her, and she, too, relapses into unconsciousness. Then it is an easy matter for Brown and Judells to clamber into the room and gain possession of the prima donna's jewels. They make their escape from the hotel, taking the python with them.

When Madame Pillard recovers consciousness she informs the hotel manager of her loss and he at once telephones for Detective Finn. The detective examines the room and discovers a trouser button that has been lost by Brown. The button bears the name of the tailor and has a fragrant of cloth attached, so that Finn is easily able to trace the crook to his house. While Finn is waiting outside Brown's house he sees a gasfitter about to enter to perform some repairs. Persuading the fitter to change clothes with him, Finn enters the house. He has just discovered where the stolen jewels are hidden when he is surprised by the crooks, who tie him up and throw him into a garret with the python. Then they decide that Judells shall motor to Folkestone and take the boat to Boulogne, while Brown shall get rid of Finn and follow later. Finn overhears this plan.

After Judells leaves the house, Billy, a newsboy friend of Finn's, who saw him enter the crook's house, decides to search for the detective. He climbs up a waterspout and enters the house, holding up Brown with the crook's own revolver and freeing Finn from the python's deadly coils.

Finn telephones for a police detective to take charge of Brown and then decides to race to Folkestone in time to apprehend Judells. There being no time to catch the boat-train he motorcycles to Hendon, charters an airship, and racing over the Folkestone express drops onto its roof. At Folkestone Finn boards the Boulogne boat, and after an exciting fight captures Judells. Detective Finn returns to London with his prisoner, and is warmly congratulated for the clever way in which he has outwitted the thieves. Billy, the newsboy, is made the detective's assistant, and the case closes as another triumph for Finn.

WOE TO THE CONQUEROR; or THE LAW OF WAR (Four parts).—In the days of yore there existed a condition when war, revolution and massacre prevailed. Vice and immoral tactics were practised by army officers to such extents that it aroused the people to a pitch of rebellion, and in such, we find the city of Persania, a terrible field of battle. After days of bloody battle, the victorious army under General Zachine, invade the home of Countess Xanthias and take possession of it. An officer is immediately captivated by the rare beauty of the young Countess; he waits his chance and in a drunken mood attacks her. A struggle ensues, in which she kills him with his own sword, and makes good her escape. Upon discovery of the head officer, General Zachine orders the arrest of the entire household and condemns them to die. The young countess returns just as her mother and servants fall victims to the law of war. At the dead body of her mother she vows to avenge her.

Two years later at the conclusion of peace Countess Xanthias secures a position in a circus show, she having no other means of a livelihood and goes by the name of Nordiska. She also secures the services of a disguised army officer who's object is to recover valuable documents stolen by General Zachine at the time of war. At a dinner Lieutenant Zachine, the general's son, is invited to a box at the circus to see the celebrated Nordiska. He attends and while performing, Nordiska sees and recognizes the son of her mother's executioner. The Lieutenant upon seeing her falls in love at first sight, and seeks an introduction. He arranges to meet her by consent; Nordiska accepts and here she sets upon the task of fulfilling her vow.

The new valet sets to work and manages to get possession of the key to the safe that contain the documents. He secures the papers, but is discovered and trapped. However, he is determined and while his captors are holding consul, he jumps out of a window. A chase follows in which he is wounded, but he succeeds in reaching Nordiska's home. Nordiska in the meantime is entertaining Lieutenant Zachine, and seeing her accomplice, leaves Zachine, secures the papers from the dying offices and escapes. The pursuing party arrive in time to see their man expire, and are surprised to find the lieutenant in an adjoining room. Upon investigation they realize the plot and go in pursuit of the fleeing Nordiska, but she is not to be caught, for by a clever ruse, she eludes pursuit. During the excitement of the chase, Lieutenant Zachine crosses the frontier lines and is put under arrest. He is brought before the governor for trial. Nordiska enters and presents the recovered documents to the governor, whereupon the lieutenant is immediately disarmed, and here we see the words of the wise Gallic distinct, "Vae Victis" or woe to the conqueror.

THE FLAMES OF JUSTICE (Five parts).—Marie, the poor farmer's girl, falls in love with the landlord's son, Conrad, and this love affair was bitterly opposed by Conrad's father, and cruelly avenged during the absence of Conrad. Conrad had given a "Black Cross!" to Marie and swore to make his father repent his rash deed. The father and son came into a conflict with the result that Conrad went into the world. The dying man accused Marie of the crime, but she abjured him by the "Black Cross" to speak the truth, and he did so. Months went by and Marie was engaged as a maid by the wife of Judge White. Meanwhile Conrad was working in a stable-yard, and one day he saw his inamorata, Marie, enter the house of the judge. Clifford, the son of the judge, was a gambler, and finding himself unable to meet his debts of honor, he resolved to steal his mother's jewels. Conrad was calling on Marie when the theft of the jewels had become known to the judge and his wife. Marie's room was about to be searched when Conrad was identified and arrested for the murder of his father.

Marie was led to believe by Clifford that he could save Conrad, if she consented to become his mistress. While Conrad escaped the gallows he was sent to prison for life. In due course of time Marie came out of a charity hospital with her infant in her arms. Marie's misery being too great to bear, she tied the "Black Cross" around the child's neck and left her to the mercy of strangers, while she went off to seek rest in the grave of the suicide. At this juncture Mr. Gibson came and rescued her and became her devoted slave for years. Meanwhile her child, Marie of the Cross, had grown up sweet and pretty to look upon, but with miserable treatment, until the Mortons passing by, chanced to witness the cruelties practiced upon her and succeeded in getting her. In her new home she grew up to be the companion and sweetheart of Harold, her benefactor's son. Harold, however, had fallen a victim of a ravishing enchantress who was none other than the mother of his sweetheart, Little Marie. His parents were heartbroken at the conduct of their boy, and Little Marie went to the Grand Gambling Saloon and pleaded with her own mother (not knowing each other) to countermand for the sake of his heartbroken parents. Harold was sent away and admonished never to return.

A few years passed and found Marie "the first" of many sorrows an outcast on the streets—a penniless beggar, and brought her child into her life, unknown as a ministering angel. Clifford White, the judge's son, came also this time and married the child (his own child), for a victim is in the long years ago, he had her mother. He bargained with Marie to drug the girl and hand her over to him as she agreed. Conrad had now been pardoned and employed by Clifford White to carry away the girl (who he pretended to Conrad was his patient), but Conrad coming into the hovel did so at a moment when the wretched woman had found on the breast of the girl "The Black Cross" with the name of Marie engraved on it. It was her own cross, her own child! Then Conrad on the heels of it learned of Marie's identity, and made known his own. Clifford was waiting in the most impatient manner outside of the hovel, and finally he rushed in to inquire the cause of Conrad's delay, but Conrad charged him with the terrible crime and seized him. In this struggle the lamp overturned and exploded, and Clifford White, a victim of his own misdoings, consumed as it were for his many crimes in "The Flames of Justice."

Some of our Newport society attended our last two performances and saw your "Ben Bolt" and "The Devil Within." It is a real pleasure to deal with you. The service is the best I have ever had and your features are real features. Send me heralds on your new stuff, and I will give you my open dates. Wishing you the best of success, I remain

Gentlemen: I am pleased to state that your features, which I have been using and which I shall continue to use, are great box office attractions. Not only do they bring in the money but each makes a decided hit with my audiences. In the beginning I was very cautious in deciding which feature to book, but now I am willing to take a chance on any of your releases. They are all good.

Yours very truly,

March 17th, 1914. JOHN RAVENGER.

Gentlemen: In spite of greater competition than ever before, I have been able to increase my business and maintain the standard of my house with your features. Everything I have booked has been good, but the majority of your attractions have been simply wonderful. The audiences are always enthusiastic and often applaud. Business is better than ever and I am glad you overcame my early doubts and induced me to try your features. Your service has been prompt and efficient, and your advertising effective.

Now is the time to get into action. Now is the time to make your business boom. Now is the time to add to your good will. Now is the time to capture these features exclusively for your particular territory.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

Splendid Business Everywhere with

"Imar the Servitor!"

Plenty of advance booking and plenty of advance interest. Even our deathless "Sapho" didn't create so much comment before its release. The same old answer of course: the American exhibitor wants every good picture. This must be good, else we wouldn't dare have advertised its "coming" on this page four consecutive times. Let just that fact speak for itself. Four reels with real stars and NO PADDING!

The darndest "punch" you ever saw in a one-reeler is in "THE TIE THAT BINDS," out Sunday, April 19th. Hogan is "out" for McGuire. Going to the latter's house, Hogan prepares to shoot McGuire and nearly takes the life of his own child, who is there, sitting in an arm chair wearing McGuire's hat. The shock puts new—higher—thoughts into Hogan's revengeful mind. And here's another: A prospector after many months of digging, locates gold. But the roof of the natural "tunnel," in which he is working, falls and he is buried alive. Then comes a little collie dog who loves him, and locates him. The rescue scene is very realistic. It's in "AN UNREDEEMED PLEDGE," out Tuesday, April 21st.

"SHOTGUN JONES"

A wild Westerner, of the gamiest type, tamed and reformed, becomes a useful citizen, and restores a lost fortune to a fascinating orphan and her brother. An interesting romantic play with plenty of thrill.

April 29th. "THE PIRATES OF PEACOCK ALLEY"

April 30th. "LITTLE MISS BOUNTIFUL"
A girl of five, finances so frenziedly, her family interfere.

May 1st. "A KNIGHT OF TROUBLE"
A discredited suitor dons a suit of armor and raises a rumpus.
On the same reel with
"THE PLOT THAT FAILED"
A shrewd mother-in-law brings sonny to terms.

BROADWAY

WE have returned from the "Coast" to tell you of more theatres on Broadway and its tributaries, using motion pictures exclusively or as a part of their entertainment.

The Herald Square, Broadway and Republic theatres must be added to those previously mentioned, as the homes of many musical and dramatic successes, now using motion pictures and Power's Service.

The use of Power's Cameragraph No. 6A, in the projection of high-class pictures, has become as much a necessary part of animated picture development, as the themes and scenic effects of our best known dramatic and musical producers.

ON SAME REEL

BATTY BILL, MONKEY AND PELICAN

Probably one of the best of this series—apart from the great housing of the comedy. It is wonderful how the Pelican and Monkey are trained. The Pelican becomes detective and the Monkey chief secretary to Batty—with whom he secures the thief of the pearl necklace. This is truly a fine reel.

Facts and Comments

WE are both surprised and pleased to receive clippings from newspapers covering every part of the country, all of which deplore the agitation for censorship of motion pictures. There is no doubt whatever that in this attitude the press reflects a growing public sentiment. People everywhere begin to notice that motion pictures have improved, and when they hear irresponsible parties wildly denouncing their favorite entertainment they are apt to resent it. They ask: "Where are these objectionable pictures? We see so many motion pictures and the bad ones seem to escape us."

Eventually public sentiment will decide this whole matter of picture regulation. It is no longer a safe, though it may be a profitable, indoor sport to harass the picture interests. We are getting the public on our side. It is the duty of the exhibitors, and especially of the organized exhibitors, to utilize this favorable public sentiment and to marshal it against hostile influences and adverse legislation. It is the duty of the producers to co-operate with the exhibitors in all such activities, which redound to the benefit of the whole industry.

THE question of censorship has many aspects. There are issues involved in the principle of censorship which have never been raised and which are not touched by the litigation now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States. No test has ever been made of the legislative power to impose censorship on pictures portraying either current events or scientific subjects. Kinematography is being used now to make demonstrations in surgery. Suppose a professor of surgery shows the details of a surgical operation to a class of medical students, must he obtain the permission of the censors? If a man wants to see the motion pictures of his own wedding or wants to show them to his friends, will he be prosecuted if he does not ask leave of the censors? Once set the machinery of censorship in motion and it is difficult to stop it. Follow it out to its logical conclusion and you will have to assign a special censor to every camera man. Eventually the studios will be run by the censors. The common sense of the public revolts at such conclusions, but who can deny that they may reasonably be drawn from the premises of official censorship.

A "BACK to the Book" movement has been started in a neighboring city by a co-operative bureau of publishers. The promoters of the movement declare that the motion picture has retarded the normal growth in the number of readers of books. The gentlemen in charge of the movement have given out a statement to the effect that "the motion picture theater has detracted the attention of the public from literature." We cannot agree with this statement. On the contrary, it has been demonstrated beyond the peradventure of a doubt that the motion pictures stimulate an existing interest in literature and often create an interest in literature where none existed before. Let a filmed version of some well-known classic be presented in a large theater and the neighboring libraries will soon have a call for the book which served as a subject for the films. The magnificent motion picture portrayal of Dante's Inferno roused an interest in this immortal book which was felt by the librarians of every city where it played. The same is true of other similar productions like "Homer's Odyssey," "Jerusalem Delivered," "Les Miserables," "Quo Vadis?" "The Last Days of Pompeii" and others too numerous to mention. The book and the motion picture are not at all hostile one to the other, but on the contrary they are supplementary of each other. They form two separate but entirely harmonious elements in the new scheme of education. Words, whether printed or spoken, are in conjunction with moving pictures an incomparable combination for reaching and teaching the human mind.

CABLE despatches from Europe announce that the exhibition of the white slave films has been prohibited by the police and that the promoters of these films have been threatened with arrest and prosecution. This shows plainly enough that the standard of common decency is international and that the exploiters of sensational crazes have little to expect in the way of profit or approval on either side of the ocean. It is curious to note that the cables again connect the name of John D. Rockefeller, Jr., with these white slave films, despite the emphatic repudiation of that gentleman of any connection with these "enterprises."

All appeals to the sense of decency being quite unavailing, it is now possible to reason with the ilk of "white slave" film promoters on the ground that these enterprises do not pay. The filming of yellow journal sensations hardly ever bring any returns. The working out of such "popular crazes" may or may not boom the circulation of a newspaper which caters to the lowest strata, but to film them and expect substantial returns from them has led to nothing but disappointments.

Between the Lines

By Louis Reeves Harrison

MANY intelligent people become deeply interested in moving pictures, even become fair judges of them, with little idea of the complexity and subtlety of mental operations by which they reach a decision for or against what they see on the screen. The popular interpretation of what is presented may not be wholly superficial, but people go to the picture show to be entertained, and do not particularly care to bother about the underlying reasons for their likes or dislikes. Their attitude, however, is of tremendous importance to the producer, and to the exhibitor, as artistic and financial success depends on studying the logical aspects of a theme and its interpretation.

The favorable or unfavorable popular opinion of a picture is largely an unconscious inference, like an offhand measurement of distance by the eye, and it rarely takes into consideration the varied elements that sum up in an effect. We pass an attractive house while driving in the country and instantly realize its composite charm. It delights our eyes and fills us with a sense of satisfaction. Then we drive on. Perhaps we remember the place and often refer to it as an ideal residence. If, however, we wish to build such a place, we become gradually enlightened, and finally amazed, at the amount of thought and feeling, to say nothing of hard work, involved in producing that structure from the moment it was conceived in the mind of creative imagination to the last finishing touches by the hands of skilled artisans.

A profound study of the building will usually reveal that it was carefully planned, before the foundations were laid, by some one competent to bring all its details into unity of form, and it will usually be found that general treatment has not varied materially from the architect's specifications. What was scarcely noticed at first now becomes obvious and well-recognized. We now think we know why the house impressed us so favorably, but we have not gone far enough. That is as far as many go who know how to design plays and to direct their interpretation on the screen, and it is farther than many go who regard themselves fine critics.

Let us visit that house. We at once become conscious of something not defined in its conception and construction. We are affected by an invisible influence, the atmosphere of home life, the subtle essence not previously manifested, a pervading spirit that warms and humanizes what might have otherwise been a cold and lifeless thing in spite of its perfect lines. That is the element in a visualized story only felt by the audience, and it is the one element that must never be absent in a story that is to win its way to human hearts. We speak of woman's beauty as if it was a material thing, but how pitiful it becomes in death. The perfect corpse is the perfect but inanimate play. It is the soul shining out through beauty that we really love. It is the warm and throbbing soul that quickens our sympathies in the individual or the drama.

If I review a play that awakens very little sympathetic feeling, I may praise its form and treatment in recognition of artistic skill shown, but it does not rank in my estimation with one which holds tense interest through what is felt in spite of technical errors. The structure of the latter may lack polish and elegance, yet profoundly stir an audience by its rude and impassioned sincerity. The function of contemporary art is something more than mere reflection—it must concern itself with penetrative interpretation.

Instead of attempting to merely reflect on the screen some past success in another art, it might be better for a producer to carefully consider if the story he is inclined to visualize contains something worth communicating to people of to-day and something that will reach and hold their attention. Competition is fast becoming one of quality, and there is bound to be a lot of bitter disappointment in the near future among those new producers who plunge into making feature plays with little knowledge of what they are undertaking and subsequent neglect of important elements of success. There is less reason to-day than ever for attempting to tell a story on the screen unless you have a good story to tell.

As to what constitutes a good story for a five-reel feature when the latter is adapted from a novel or from a stage play, give first consideration to whether there is enough matter of sustained interest in the original to hold an audience for two solid hours. "Is there a big story here that has not been told and that will keep an audience enthralled for a protracted period?" If there is not enough material in the original—nearly always the case—is there some principle, some truth, of human life which may be formulated in the abstract from the original play's general proposition? Is there a live theme capable of being entertainingly conveyed through the medium of moving pictures?

If there is a general truth of life for the spectator to learn or consider, remember that this theme is the soul of the story and is not to be placarded in any of the titles nor thrust upon the audience in the manipulation. Its nature is spiritual—it is to be read between the lines. It may pervade the body and animate its movements, but the very fact that it is not obvious adds to the enjoyment of people watching the story. The very mystery of it keeps them waiting for something specific to happen which shall logically, plausibly and satisfactorily solve the problem involved. If this secret is worth keeping, it must be equally worth telling. The anticipation aroused must be fulfilled, for the audience will be disgusted at the end if it is discovered, after all, that the play is a soulless dummy.

It is a fine art to tell a good story from start to finish and permit this depth of motive to be felt, rather than revealed in an obvious and ordinary manner. But it is the subtle effect that oftenest carries a story from the vast desert of mediocrity into an oasis of success. After an author has mastered a wonderful plan, after directors and interpreters have done their best to develop and complete the structure, there will be a thing of beauty to gaze upon and one deserving high praise, but it might as well be marble or painted panel if there is not an individuality of thought or purpose hidden in it as we are hidden in our bodies, manifested by the unconscious processes which make character known.

This new art's progress, its popularity, its profit, all depend upon quality of product, and the most beautiful quality in that product is a meaning whispered by minds of creative talent to the millions who sit in darkness and silence and waiting more for what is revealed than what is expressed. Only at rare moments are we permitted to glimpse the true characters of those with whom we are constantly associated—so the vital principle of a story is glimpsed—it is not so much the thing we say, nor even the way we say it that most deeply interests those who are listening to us—what they are after is the motive behind it all.

Gradations in Service.

By W. Stephen Bush

SIX months ago the condition of the film market, and indeed the future of the motion picture generally, seemed to baffle the most experienced and keen-witted of observers. There was a vague feeling that the multiple reel had come into permanent dominion; there was much discussion and some confusion as to just what made a feature different from a mere multiple reel; there was a good deal of speculation as to just what effect the entrance of many new producers and importers would have on the market; there were constant changes in the policy of some of the dominant factors in the industry. Things appeared to be in fermentation, and few men were daring enough to venture any prophecies as to the final crystallizations.

To some extent at least this uncertainty has now passed away, and we may catch a glimpse of new alignments and new departures. For a long time all film production and all film service has been tending toward some system of gradation. This goal is now plainly in sight. The lines of cleavage appear more sharp and distinct than they ever were before. In every part of the country new theaters have been built, most of them specially designed for photoplay entertainments. These theaters have aimed principally at three things: good projection, large capacity and the highest degree of comfort with safety. The number of old theaters changing to motion pictures has also increased all over the country. All these larger theaters have recognized the importance of presentation and the importance of having none but the best pictures obtainable. These theaters could no more be served by the old time-table releases than a stout man could be fitted into a suit intended for a thin man. It is here, then, that the gradation of service begins. The owner and manager of a first-class modern motion picture theater is naturally looking for the cream of the film productions, for he cannot use any other variety of service and hold his patronage.

At present there is comparatively but little of this cream. The men who run the big theaters, especially the big theaters where no daily change is practised, know that this statement is no theory, but an actual condition. It cannot be denied that the present methods of distribution are far from satisfactory to the first-class exhibitor. Just as soon as a chain, say, of twenty or thirty big theaters all catering to strictly high-class patronage, is well established, there will be the nucleus for a good demand for exclusively high-class films. These films will in all probability be marketed along entirely new lines, and the old-fashioned state-right plan will be improved upon. If a producer of high-class specials knows that thirty big theaters stand ready to pay substantial prices for a rental of a week or two weeks or a month, the problem of cost will be solved in part at least. It is for the best interests of the industry that films of the first class begin their travels at the top.

It is not difficult to imagine a strong chain or a number of strong chains of theaters of the second class. The line of division between theaters of the first and the second class will in all probability be marked by the length of the entertainment. The first-class feature is apt to exceed four reels in length, though there will be exceptions. The shorter features with a suitable admixture of single reels will in all probability constitute the general program of the theaters of the second class.

This classification does not and is not intended to exhaust the list. There will be a third class of theaters which in point of quality may challenge comparison with any of the bigger theaters, but which, owing to a smaller seating capacity, must needs depend chiefly on variety and a short program. We firmly believe that in this process of evolution the unfit theater will be painlessly eliminated. In speaking of unfit theaters or misfit theaters we mean the theaters that cater by preference to the tastes of the vulgar and of the morbid.

There is room in this country for different classes of picture houses, and there is a distinct sphere of usefulness for each one. The process of gradation which is going on now, and which will run its course until a perfect system is reached, will bring great and lasting benefits to the industry at large. Gradation will do away with waste. What the motion picture industry and especially the exhibitor has suffered from lack of gradation in the past is incalculable. We have repelled audiences in the fine residential section by cheap melodrama and an excess of "Wild West," and we have often made a misplaced appeal with the classics to audiences whose tastes are of a wholly different kind. Graded service will make it easier for the exhibitor. The man in the Five Points District will no longer find films like "King Oedipus" in his can, while the exhibitor who caters to the upper West Side will no longer be obliged to explain so many "Rattle Snake Bills" to his indignant patrons.

The gradation in the quality of theater and of film will naturally be followed by a gradation in prices. The public has been educated to dissociate the high-class picture entertainment from the nickel. There was a time when such an achievement would have been considered incredible. The time when a raise in the price of admission brought forth an indignant protest: "What! pay a dollar for moving pictures?" is passing away as rapidly as the best friends of the picture could wish.

While gradation will not abolish competition, it will in all likelihood confine it within the bounds of reason. It is scarcely probable that one exhibition will attempt to draw any patronage from another whose audience is quite different in its tastes from his own. Competition will exist more likely between exhibitors seeking to reach the same audiences and to please the same tastes.

The public has been ready for this gradation of service and quality for some time past. Indeed, it may well be said that the public has insisted upon gradation. Nor will the valuable democratizing tendencies of the motion picture suffer through a natural process of gradation. The educational values of the film will in varying proportions be found in every class of theater.

THOSE WHO FAVOR A RAISE, SAY—"I."

Stanley, Wis., April 13, 1914.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: Please find enclosed check to cover the cost of my subscription to your valuable paper. The reviews in it are alone worth many times the subscription price to me, for I have learned to rely on them and they have saved me from many pitfalls. The exhibitors can well afford to pay $4 for what you are giving them and I believe nearly all of them would not kick if this was done, besides you are actually giving them more than one dollar's worth extra now, in the difference between the publication at this time, and the time when the price was raised to $3. I remain,

Very truly yours,

Manager Star Theater. TOM FOSTERS.

"The Swamp Fox"

Kalem Produces a Three-Part Story of the Revolution—To be Released by the General Film Company.

AMONG the feature subjects released by the General Film Company during the week of April 26th is a three-part production, entitled, "The Swamp Fox," being episodes from the military career of General Francis Marion, whose services to the cause of American independence won for him distinction and honor. Every American school boy has read of the daring expeditions organized against the British forces operating from Charleston, S. C., after that town was surrendered by the American General Gage, and how, with his ill-armed, poorly-clad band of farmer riflemen, he practically caused the British to withdraw their forces from that section of the Colonies. To the boys as well as to the grown-ups this picture will have added charm because of the strong flavor of patriotism with which it is tempered.

Then there is just a bit of heart interest injected by the thread of a love affair which is woven into the otherwise strenuous story of bitter warfare in which quarter was neither given nor asked. History as it is taught is not explicit of this phase of the life of General Marion, but as it is reasonable to suppose that so brave a man must have had many admirers among the fair sex the writer of the story from which the picture was made was justified in drawing some such conclusion; then, too, it is the custom to weave love stories into all our historical pictures.

The story takes up the life of Francis Marion at a time prior to the breaking out of hostilities with Great Britain when the Indians menaced the lives and prosperity of the colonists. During those troublous times Young Marion became the leader of the colonists and defeated the Indian marauders in many a foray. It was on one of these occasions that he is pictured as rescuing a young white girl from the Indians and giving her into the keeping of his sister after her father and mother had been killed in the attack.

Ten years is supposed to have elapsed and Marion returns home a Colonial congressman to find the girl grown to womanhood. He falls in love with her, but believing his nephew, Gabriel, and the girl are in love with each other, he conceals his affection. Balfour, a young Tory, is also in love with the girl, whose name is Mary, and becomes jealous of Gabriel with whom he has a serious encounter in which there is some sword play. Balfour is worsted and dismissed in deep chagrin by Marion, who interferes at a critical moment.

Shortly after this news comes that Cornwallis has landed at Charlestown. Marion gathers up his farmers and starts to offer his services to General Gates. Gates treats his proffers with contempt, telling Marion that he wants soldiers, not ragamuffins. Soon after this Gates is defeated and the memorable strife that gave Marion his name of "Swamp Fox" was begun when the British tried to drive him out of the Carolina swamps and capture him.

Event succeeds event in which Balfour and Mary play an active part. The Tory has associated himself with the infamous Tarleton and betrays Marion's hiding place. Marion's sister and Mary take refuge at the home of a Mrs. Motte, but Tarleton appropriates this refuge as his headquarters and the women are ejected, Mary being kept a prisoner at the suggestion of Balfour, who is determined to have her for his own.

When these happenings come to the ear of Marion he sets out to rescue the girl. A fight occurs at the Motte house and Gabriel, who approaches the house under a flag of truce, is shot by Balfour. In the fight that follows the house is captured and Balfour is killed. After that it is plain sailing for Marion with the girl and the ending is as happy as every Kalem.

Guy Coombs is an heroic Marion and bears himself well and soldierly throughout the three reels. Marguerite Courtot takes the part of Mary in a sweet, winsome manner. The scenic effects—bits of southern wastes—are well chosen and the handling of the combatants is such as to give the picture a touch of realism that is all sufficient. There is action and interest throughout, making the "Swamp Fox" one of the best of the feature subjects the General Film Company has offered in some time.

BETWEEN THE SCENES IN CALIFORNIA.

If you don't think that the picture players are happy look at this picture. The Vitagraph players at Santa Monica, during the whole year, eat like this every day under the spreading fig tree in the back-yard of the studio. The girl at the right of the table is Hazel Henderson, while at her left is Otto Lederer, and just next to him is Daisy Smith, of the scenario department. Karl Formes is at the left of the table and just behind him is Director George C. Stanley. The characters in the background are the cameramen and stage directors.

It seems queer, but, however, it is true, that these photo-players eat outdoors in shirtsleeves and bareheads all the year round. Last week the whole company went ocean swimming at the beach. And that is why they all like to work in the Sunny State, "where watermelons grow all the year round."

"Pierre of the Plains"

Five Parts—All-Star Feature Corporation.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

MORE vivid than a novel and far more convincing and realistic than the stage is this motion picture portrayal of lights and shadows in the life of the Canadian Northwest. Broadly speaking, the success of the filmed version of this play depended on two things mainly: On the man who was to impersonate the part of Pierre and upon the atmosphere. In both these essentials it seemed to me the play measured up to what we had a right to expect. Edgar Selwyn, the author of the play and often the portrayer of the leading character, has stood the test of the camera well. Without the aid of words, upon which he had for years relied with natural confidence, he has conveyed to us all the shades which go to make up the complex character of Pierre. Pierre has a bad reputation. He is a handsome fellow in whose veins the volatile blood of the French and the crafty daring of the Indian are mixed in puzzling proportions. The love of a woman brings the good in him to the surface and he becomes a man worthy of the affections of a good woman.

Mr. Selwyn knew how to make the character sympathetic and he endeared himself to the audience from the first. I must say that in view of the diversity in characters and in view of the complexity of the action a subtitle or two in the early stages of the plot might help. Once the spectator has grasped the relation of the parties he can have no trouble in following the course of action. I would rather miss a few of the later titles and put in a few at the beginning of things. The working of the North West Royal Mounted Police has of course an intense human interest. Here the realism of the picture rises to admirable heights. It is easy to believe that the producing company "were quartered in the hearts of the North Woods for more than four weeks and that the thermometer hovered around forty below." Of course this fact shows to some extent in the photography, but few will consider this a defect as it is the most positive proof of the fact that the pictures were indeed taken in regions very similar to those of the far Northwest.

The atmosphere was not all dependant on scenery alone. The very breath of the rugged life in the wilderness of snow is in the films. We experience the sensation particularly delightful to us children of an artificial civilization of being among primitive men surrounded by primitive conditions; we are made to feel that in the shadows of these somber forests and upon the vast plains of snow and amid the savage children of an alien race the real worth of a man comes to the surface and here hearts are weighed in an unerring balance.

The acting of William Conklin (Durkin), of Joseph Rieder (Vail), of William Riley Hatch (Peter Galbraith), and Sydney Seward (Sergeant Tom), was entirely satisfactory. Dorothy Dalton as "Jen" made an earnest effort to rise to her part, but it seemed to me as if it were not entirely congenial to her and at times she lacked both emphasis and power of characterization. It was no easy part, but it had great possibilities.

While both adaptation and direction bore marks of high quality, it must be pointed out that the drugging of Sergeant Tom was not conveyed in a plain manner. Indeed there was doubt in the audience as to whether the drugging had or had not been done. As the incident of the drugging is part of the plot and its subsequent development, it should stand out with the clearness of letters on a monument instead of which it seems buried in agate, decipherable but to few.

The great strength of "Pierre of the Plains" lies in its finish. It is wrought out in the films with rare art, beauty and power. Another point of merit is the element of suspense which holds us from the moment we understand the cast and the plot to the very last inch of the film. It is a play which has not even a mite of lost motion in its five thousand feet and which leaves a deep but most pleasing memory in every one lucky enough to see it.

Donald McKenzie.

DONALD McKENZIE, whose motion picture experience dates back to The Cameraphone Company, the original talking pictures, has been for the past year actor-director for Pathe Freres. Mr. McKenzie made his theatrical debut in Forbes Robertson's company, in the tragedy, "For the Crown." Following this, a season in London with George Edward's Daly Theater company, in the musical comedy success, "A Country Girl."

Donald McKenzie.

Mr. McKenzie came to America in 1903 to join the Augustin Daly Musical Company at Daly's Theater, New York, and play Lord Anchester in "A Country Girl," his original part.

After a short dramatic season as leading man with Madame Pilar Morin in the Japanese tragedy, "O Mat San," Mr. McKenzie again took to musical comedy playing "Fairfax" in F. C. Whitney's production of "Dolly Vardon"; "Gen. Allen" in "When Johnnie Comes Marching Home" came next; two seasons with the W. T. Carleton Opera Company; "Lord Mito" in "The Royal Chef"; "Johnnie Hicks" in H. H. Frazee's "Time, Place and Girl."

About this time, Mr. McKenzie was engaged as motion picture leading man with Kalem's New York company. After a year of this, he received an offer from Weber and Fields to create the comedy part of the Parlor Boarder in their production of "The June Bride." On his return to New York, he became leading man with Pathe Freres. A few months later, Mr. Gasnier, head director of Pathe Freres, gave him a picture to produce. He is at present working as actor-director with Mr. Gasnier in the popular series picture, "The Perils of Pauline," taking the part of the Pirate.

"On Life's High Sea"

Gloria—Three Reels.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature is a superb picture telling a story of tender and intense human interest. The settings are beyond all praise. The plot needed a rocky, impregnable fortress from which escape seemed impossible. The producers have found an ideal spot, a castle perched upon inaccessible heights with the waves of the sea washing the precipitous shores below. All the outdoor settings are of the same realistic and artistic variety. The settings showing the tempestuous surf and the escape of the officers are particularly fine. The photography has never been surpassed, and equalled but rarely.

The story deals with the days of Bourbon tyranny and oppression in the early part of the last century, and the theater of action is Naples. Three officers in the Bourbon army have been members of a patriotic society and upon being discovered they are degraded and condemned to death. Their friends, however, have not been idle.

The patriots have adherents in all classes of society, among the poor and lowly no less than among the rich and influential. A note is smuggled into the prison wherein the three young men are confined and a bold plan for their delivery has been conceived. The plan succeeds, thanks mainly to the daring and patience of a poor fisherman, who has given his heart to the cause of his country's freedom. The rescued patriots are safe in the shelter of the fisherman's cottage. The fisherman's wife is ill to the great sorrow of her little son, a charming little lad of six. He goes out to get medicine for his mother, but having no money he is turned away by the druggist. Secret agents of the government have followed him and by promising him money for his mother's medicine they induce him to take them to his home where the hiding officers are found and arrested.

The patriots, suspecting the fisherman of treachery, summon him before their secret council and are about to condemn him to death when the little boy appears and by his ingenous answers and actions reveals the truth showing the innocence of his father. Thereupon the patriots acquit the fisherman, who is later arrested by Bourbon spies and himself condemned to death. Once more the little boy comes to the rescue in the nick of time.

There are many fine pathetic touches in this feature. One of its greatest merits consists in its winning the sympathy of the audience from the start and holding it to the last. The acting is strong and natural and much above the average. Exceptionally fine types of men and women have been selected. The boy in particular is bright and intelligent and takes his part with no mean skill.

"A FLURRY IN HATS" (American).

HARRY POLLARD, Miss Margarita Fischer and their clever company have turned out a most enjoyable comedy under the title, "A Flurry in Hats," a "Beauty" film that will be released by the American on April 28.

The complications of the story are very funny, and what makes them still more enjoyable is the fact that they are by no means far fetched. They impress one as being very probable indeed, and the action has none of the farcical element about it.

Young men and young women, as well as old men and old women(who have braved the tempestuous sea of matrimony, will laugh heartily at the icidents in which hats—feminine hats if one will be pardoned for assigning them gender—fill the vision to the exclusion of every other object.

Scene from "A Flurry in Hats" (America).

I refuse to tell the story, for that would take a great deal of the spanking novelty from this mirthful diversion. You must let the film tell it, and then take your laughs as they come! and, believe me, they will come fast and furious near the close.

Miss Fischer, as Hattie Hood Dunlap, the young wife, starts the fun that keeps accumulating until her young husband, her father, her mother and Bridget, the cook, get mixed up worse than her first pie—if she ever made one. And her acting is as dainty as the best made, first-class pie ever turned out by an expert.

Harry Pollard, as the husband, Fred Gamble, as the father, and Mary Scott, as the mother of the young wife, fit in so well that one cannot even wish for substitutes. And Jane Shafer is a peach as Bridget, the cook.

WINSOME MARY FULLER WINS.

Mary Fuller, the "Mary" of "What Happened to Mary," the "Dolly" of "Dolly of the Dailies," and particularly bright and scintillating star of a hundred other Edison photoplays, has just been notified that she is the first choice in a popularity contest recently concluded at Dallas, Tex. Almost forty thousand votes were cast in this contest which was conducted by the Times-Herald, of Dallas, and the count disclosed the fact that Mary Fuller had received 9,298, about one-fourth of the total.

THE feature that was in process of production when the Edison Studio burned, "The Southerners," has apparently not suffered thereby. It is a story of love and adventure in war times whose main incidents are grouped around the Battle of Mobile Bay. The cast comprises some of the finest of photo-drama interpreters and they respond so well to what is required of them that no fault can be found with their work. Mabel Trunnelle carries off the honors, a habit that seems to be growing on her, with Bigelow Cooper a good second.

The story opens with a scene of great beauty, one of Ridgely's well-chosen natural backgrounds. His taste of selection contributes heavily to the charm of productions he directs. Mary Annan, typical southern girl, proud, pure and sweet, has what Louis the Eleventh of France decided to be distinctly a feminine attribute when he wrote on a window pane at Fontainbleau with his diamond ring, "Souvent femme variee," or, in English, "Ladies often change their minds." It has since been discovered that gentlemen may take the same liberty, but tradition has fastened inconstancy on woman. Mary Annan is in a state of doubt, hovering between Boyd Peyton and Robert Darrow, with the odds in favor of Peyton. The latter is an officer of the United States Navy, and his homecoming at the beginning of war starts the story.

The antipathy between southerners and northerners, one dating back to the days of Cavaliers and Roundheads, was bitterest among women. The "Yankee" represented all that was vulgar to the average southern lady and she became a tremendous factor in the Civil War, urging her loved ones to fight for the "Southern Cause," ready to aid them in every extremity, at once the bravest and gentlest of creatures, idolized and idealized from those days of blood and iron to these of apology and grape juice.

On Boyd Peyton falls the self-struggle that tortured many a southern man serving the flag at the beginning of hostilities between brother Americans. Honor demanded allegiance to the nation, inclination, allegiance to family. The young naval officer was asked by his friends and expected by his sweetheart to lead a company in battling for "The Cause," but he decides for the flag and loses the girl. Mary pledges herself to Robert Darrow, Boyd's rival.

"The Southerners" now takes on a military character. We are shown the field actions in which Darrow participates and in which he meets with a brave man's death. More stirring are the scenes aboard the flagship "Hartford" in which Boyd Peyton serves under Farragut. Boyd's father, General Peyton, is an officer at Fort Morgan during the action between Farragut's fleet and the shore batteries, so that we view what was common enough in those times, men of the same blood arrayed against one another in deadly conflict.

Boyd Peyton performs an act of valor beneath his father's eyes, when he commands an open boat that Farragut sends to the relief of men on the sinking "Tecumseh," General Peyton watching the exploit through a glass from the walls of the fort. The young officer is desperately wounded later in the action, and he is taken ashore when Mobile is captured, to become the charge of Mary Annan. When peace comes to the land, it comes to their young hearts in complete reconciliation.

The deck scenes during action are those of highest value, affording a spirited touch of realism. Edison productions of naval warfare have been consistently strong in this particular, but there is a tendency in them not to glimpse the sea which might be corrected in future, similar plays. The exploit of Boyd Peyton in saving the Tecumseh's men while exposed to a storm of shell from the forts would have contributed materially to the effect. To see him leave the ship and return again and cover his absence with a subtitle is not enough. While the people in front readily accept a statement that the hero has done a brave thing, they would prefer to see him do it.

The Edison Company has done much to keep alive patriotism by plays of this kind, and is well equipped by experience to give others. Why not release one or more features showing events of the war between this country and Mexico in 1845, the battles won by Taylor, or those by Scott, or the reduction of California by Fremont and Stockton, all resulting in the treaty which gave us California, Nevada, Utah, most of Arizona and parts of New Mexico, Colorado and Wyoming, with maps to show what civilization gained at that period of our history.

DELTA THEATER CORPORATION.

New Company That Will Combine Picture House With Restaurant and Dance Hall on Broadway.

The Delta Theater Corporation is the name of the company which has secured control of the old Metropolitan Rink property at Broadway and 52d Street, New York City, and is changing the structure into a combined picture theater and restaurant with cabaret and "tango hall." The company was organized by George F. Kerr, a well-known showman who has interested himself in motion picture exhibition for the past several years and who has a long record of successes in catering to the public in theatrical lines. He has associated with him in this new venture several capatalists, among whom are Charles J. Hite, president of the Thanhouser Company, so that there is ample backing for the enterprise.

The building is being remodeled. In the half fronting on Broadway a picture theater seating 800 persons is being built after the most approved designs. The east half of the building fronting on Seventh Avenue will combine a restaurant and dancing floor. The balcony of the theater will be the exclusive section of the house. Only loge seats will be provided and the prices will insure patronage of the highest class. This balcony will be connected with the restaurant balcony, also exclusive. Catering to women's clubs will be the policy of the company, although other organizations and individuals will be provided for at all times.

The name chosen for the new place of amusement is "Broadway Gardens." Pictures of the highest class will be shown. A large pipe organ and an orchestra will provide music for the theater and restaurant and refined cabaret and exhibition dancing will provide entertainment in the restaurant. It is expected that the "Broadway Gardens" will be ready for the public sometime in May.

PRODUCER THOMAS RICKETTS, of the American, has given patrons of that product a two-part subject, "In the Moonlight," which has many delightful light effects and artistic settings. The story has a sad ending, but the effect is lightened by the careful avoidance of gruesome details.

The cast is exceptionally strong, as we have Miss Winifred Greenwood, Miss Charlotte Burton, Ed. Coxen and Geo. Field in the leading characters. Miss Greenwood, in the part of Mary Langton, brings out strongly the disappointment of a young woman, flushed with health and hope, who is deceived by the wealthy broker, George Lytton, a married man, to whom she has given her affections, ignorant of the fact that he is a man of family. Miss Burton, as Sunshine, Mary Langton's niece, is buoyant and girlish, and carries with her the atmosphere of happiness and innocence in her first love affair that ends so happily. Ed. Coxen gives us another finished portraiture in the part of Frank Lytton, the sweetheart of sunshine. George Lytton, father of Frank and the unscrupulous character of the story, has an able counterpart in the person of George Field. The society woman, Dora Westley, mother of Sunshine and sister of Mary Langton, is very capably represented by Miss Josephine Ditt.

Mary Langton is visiting at the home of her married sister, Dora Westley, where George Lytton, Dora's broker, is also a guest. He is a man of fine appearance and great personal magnetism, and prides himself on his conquests among the fair sex. Dora omits to tell Mary that the rich broker is a married man, and Mary gives her heart to him before the truth is disclosed.

On a beautiful moonlit night the pair take a canoe trip on the river, and Mary acknowledges her love. Learning after the trip that Lytton has deceived her, Mary sharply rebukes her sister for the oversight made at the introduction, and, seized with an overpowering revulsion for the man, she immediately quits her sister's home and leaves, heartbroken, for a tour of foreign lands.

Years pass and Lytton has forgotten the incident. His son, Frank, has grown to young manhood, and Sunshine, Dora's daughter, has arrived at the age where she gives her first house party. Dora invites Frank for the occasion and also his father. At the same time she receives a letter from Mary, who advises her that she is on her way to see herself and Sunshine once more.

Frank arrives a week before his father, and in that time is thoroughly captivated by Sunshine's charms. The girl reciprocates his advances, but Frank has not yet proposed. At this juncture Mary Langton arrives, and learning that Frank is the son of the man who deceived her, she plans revenge.

Mary's charm of manner, aided by her physical beauty, is employed to win Frank's favor, and the boy, unskilled in love affairs, becomes a captive.

George Lytton now arrives, and is seized with consternation as he learns of his son's infatuation, because he can see Mary's motive. He implores her to spare his son, forgetting that he had showed no mercy in Mary's case. But his pleas have no force to move the woman, whose heart has already decided that Frank is not for her, but for Sunshine. Then she takes another trip in the old canoe down the river with the moonlight shining just as sweetly as on that other night long ago; but she is alone. And as we gaze we catch our last glimpse of the canoe, creeping out of the shadows of the sedges, and it is empty! The release date is May 4.

WILLIAM HERSHBERG GOES ABROAD.

AMONG the passengers who sailed on the Imperator, Wednesday, April 15, was the president of the General Feature Film Co., of Chicago, William Hershberg. Mr. Hershberg, under whose management the General Feature Film Co. has grown to considerable proportions, spent a week in looking over the market in New York.

He expects to remain abroad for a period of about two months, during which time he will study conditions and endeavor to find a few special features that look suitable and inviting for the American market. He intends to make London his headquarters for a few days and then go on the continent.

William Hershberg.

Few feature men are better known in the middle west than Mr. Hershberg, who rose to his present position of prominence through his industry and integrity. Mr. Hershberg, though still a young man, has had much experience both in the exhibiting and distributing branches of the industry and he is known all over as a keen judge of good pictures. During his stay abroad the General Feature Film Company will move into newer and larger quarters, the growth of the business having been such as to necessitate this change.

ALL STAR GETS LEW DOCKSTADER.

Contract has been entered into between the All Star Feature Corporation and the great minstrel and black-face comedian, Lew Dockstader, for the debut in motion pictures of this widely known comedian. For so many years it seems the oldest inhabitant must have been young when he began, Dockstader has been entertaining the audiences of the world with quip and jest.

It is the present plan of the All Star Corporation that immediately upon the completion of Upton Sinclair's powerful story, "The Jungle," Dockstader will begin work on his production. An especially written scenario by a writer well known to theatergoers and fiction readers will furnish the vehicle in which he is to appear.

TO these splendid players the Vitagraph Company has intrusted a powerful story. It is adapted by Eugene Mullin from the play and novel by Archibald Clavering Gunter. Mr. Mullin has earned the thanks of picture-goers. He has surmounted an obstacle that has been responsible for the wreck of many a fine production in its journey from stage to screen—a long cast. The action runs swiftly, clearly, and above all, cumulatively. It always holds; many times it thrills and as often it stirs. Dramatic situations abound, but there are moments of pathos and also of merriment.

Scene from "Mr. Barnes of New York" (Vitagraph).

It was said of a battle off Santiago nearly sixteen years ago that it was a captains' fight. It might be said of "Mr. Barnes of New York" that it is an actors' play. So equally is the work divided that the mind automatically recalls the famous saying of Commodore Schley, uttered at the conclusion of the combat just referred to: "There is glory enough for all." From Veteran Charles Kent to Near Miss Adele De Garde the work of the cast is uniformly excellent.

Maurice Costello and Robert Gaillord direct the production. Mr. Costello in the title role typifies the easy-going New Yorker in search of amusement abroad, as ready to start a fight on his own account when to him it seems necessary as he is to do his best to prevent others from fighting when it seems unnecessary. Mr. Costello has the faculty of clear enunciation, if so it may be termed—oftentimes one may read his lips. An instance of this was when, as he looked carefully at the name engraved on the dueling pistol, he said: "I'll remember that name"; or, again, at the denouement, as he nonchalantly, deliberately remarked: "I am Mr. Barnes of New York."

Mary Charleson, as Marina Paoli, the ward of Count Danella, portrays a difficult role with intelligence and skill. It is a part making heavy demands on emotional qualities, and containing many pitfalls. A sister waiting in her home for a visit from her only relative, a brother, is summoned to a distant point. She arrives and finds on the beach the body of her brother. She is told he has been killed by an unknown English naval officer; she swears a vendetta. Later when she falls in love with a man she knows must be a brother officer of the slayer of Antonio she reluctantly recants her oath of vengeance. After her marriage she is told her husband is the slayer. All the evidence points to him. It is Mr. Barnes who clears matters. The role of Marina is in all essentials the antithesis of the light and airy part Miss Charleson so cleverly sustained in "The Honeymooners," the silent comedy which for nine weeks held the stage in the Vitagraph Theater, which makes her success in "Mr. Barnes" all the more notable.

William Humphrey as the guardian in love with his ward, and who later tries to encompass the death of Marina's husband in the belief that he is the man who slew Antonio, gives a fine, a finished, performance. That Danella meets his eavesdropping death even as did snooping, loquacious old Polonius behind the arras is regrettable. It is not required by the demands of retributive justice; it is a gratuitous tragical contribution of the author. Danella is animated throughout by a regard for the customs of Corsica—an eye for an eye—he never knew the life he so faithfully sought was snuffed out at the bombardment of Alexandria. Charles Kent as Tomasso, the servant of Marina, is Charles Kent. We can't add anything to that statement.

Darwin Karr and Donald Hall, the English officers, make a splendid team. Mr. Karr is at his best in his efforts to win the hand of the Corsican girl who is struggling between regard for her self-imposed obligation and affection for Lieutenant Anstruther. Mr. Hall has a most wholesome likable personality, and in his short part makes a distinct hit. The selection of these two men was ideal. Miss Childers as the English girl, the sister of Anstruther, does her best work in the scenes in the railway carriage, when she is compelled through hunger to capitulate to the persistence of the fascinated, acquaintance-seeking, scheming Mr. Barnes.

Albert Roccardi, the railway guard who so efficiently aids Mr. Barnes in his conquest, furnishes a bit of delightful comedy. So, too, does little—at least, she used to be—Adele

De Garde, the mischievous miss who is kept in extremely short dresses the better to befog the guessers as to the maternal age.

The staging is of the Vitagraph's best—barring the over-water bombardment, that is palpably stagy. The on-shore scenes of the tumbling buildings and scurrying natives are well done. There are many artistic backgrounds, some natural, some artificial. The interiors are finely appointed. The photography is striking—practically the entire picture is toned. One factor that unquestionably adds to the effectiveness of the production at the Vitagraph Theater is the musicianly work of the organist. Except during scenes of turmoil, such, for instance, as the bombardment, it has a subtle, subconscious influence; unobtrusive but ever-present.

FAVERSHAM IN "A SOCIAL HIGHWAYMAN."

Though Daniel V. Arthur, managing director of the Playgoers Film Company, is now in France and just about as busy on the Cavalieri-Muratore production of "Manon Lescaut" as a producer could well be with a company of from 50 to 250 on his hands each day, he found time on Saturday last to cable his New York office that he had completed arrangements with Miss Alice Kauser for "A Social Highwayman" as the vehicle in which William Faversham will make his initial bow in motion pictures. Mr. Faversham has agreed to close his season in St. Louis on May 9 and report of the Playgoers' Yonkers studio on May 12, to begin immediate work on the presentation. "A Social Highwayman" is from the pen of Elizabeth Phipps Train and was played with great success by the late E. M. and Joseph Holland in their joint starring tours.

Mr. Arthur, Edward A. Morange and the acting members of the "Manon Lescaut" company expect to reach New York not later than May 8.

THE story of the legendary hero of Switzerland is said to be taken from the "chronicle" of Peterman Utterlin, clerk of the Court in Lucerne and captain in the wars against Duke Charles of Burgundy. The Tell legend in its Swiss form appeared for the first time in the latter part of the fifteenth century in a manuscript known as the "White Book of Sarmen," which places the events after the accession of Rudolph to the Austrian throne in 1273.

Scene from "William Tell."

Schiller's drama, "William Tell," is, however, founded upon other "chronicles," which say that the main incident occurred in 1307. They are not well enough authenticated to be regarded as historical, and have been preserved because of the interesting story from which the photodrama closely follows. This would argue that, in order to become immortal, one must not only make history, but such history as may be preserved in entertaining form.

"William Tell," the five-reel feature, starts off with realistic details, picturing the decree of Duke Albrecht of Austria summoning the Swiss of three cantons to do him homage as their King. The proclamation is read to the liberty-loving Swiss people and leaves them saddened. They send a messenger to the King with an explanation that they are living under ancient Letters of Freedom, but he refuses to ratify such a form of government.

Master Stauffacher, one of the wealthy Swiss farmers, who has built him a chalet of grand proportions, is among those who most deeply deplore the evil times to come "when the strong men of the cantons shall weep bitterly and their freedom lie in the dust." What he vaguely foretells comes upon him when Lord Gessler invades the region with his men. This autocrat decided that Stauffacher's home is too pretentious for a peasant, and burns the beautiful place, reared with pains and toil of many years, to the ground.

Gessler's soldiers become engaged in the same pursuit that is going on to this day, that of pillaging the weak, though we do it through the courts in more costly fashion. The soldiers take the cattle of an old farmer named Heinrich, stating that a peasant should draw his own plough. Heinrich's son resists and strikes down one of the soldiers. He is pursued into the mountains and hides in a cave. His father is ordered by Gessler to produce the boy in three days or have his eyes put out with hot irons.

This preparation, exhibiting the outrageous oppression of the self-exalted ruler, is all done in an interesting manner, before the central figure makes his appearance. The Swiss are characterized as simple and peace-loving, and this has its bearing on the personality of Tell. None of these children of the hills and valleys is represented an pugnacious, even in resistance to oppression. They attempt to organize, but a leader is lacking. They decide in conference to call upon a man of great physique and gentle heart, the mightiest hunter of the mountains, noted for his skill with the crossbow, William Tell.

Tell's character, as shown in both his family and social relations, is that of a man almost incapable of animosity. He has all the freedom his heart desires. He has a simple chalet high up in the Alps, a high-minded wife, and children, particularly a boy who is near to his heart. He has the mountains to range, and game in plenty for his needs. The boyish innocence of his nature hardly qualifies him for a military leader, and it plays an important part in one of the leading events of his career.

Tell lives so far from the centers of turmoil and conspiracy that he knows nothing about political affairs, and it thus happens that he disobeys an order issued by Lord Gessler, the murderous and usurping Huerta of his day. He, in fact, meets Gessler while descending from the mountains, and the latter, a coward by nature, shrinks away at the sight of the famous hunter. Tell is passing through a village when two soldiers indicate Gessler's hat on an upraised pole, the perpetual symbol of his authority, and order Tell to bow to this mockery. He refuses, and an uproar follows.

Scene from "William Tell."

Gessler and a band of soldiers arrive and place Tell under arrest. A cruel penalty is imposed on the spot. He is required to shoot an apple placed on the head of his little son. He breaks down at the thought — the lion in him is hard to rouse — but he recovers when his child shows no fear. The boy is confident that his father's markmanship will set him free. Tell draws two arrows, places one ready in his belt and sends the other through the apple. Gessler asks what the other arrow is for, and Tell boldly replies that it was for Gessler if he, by mischance, injured his boy. For this he is arrested and dragged away to be imprisoned in Kussnacht Castle.

The episodes of bowing to the hat and shooting an apple placed on his child's head are purely legendary, appearing in earlier German tales and old Norse myths, but they furnish interest to the Swiss revolt under Tell's leadership and have become so identified with his story that they have come to be regarded as historical.

Tell escapes while being ferried across a lake to the Castle, and this incident proves to be one of the most interesting in the photodrama. He is a powerful man in appearance and proves to be one in reality. He leaps into the lake and climbs a precipitous rock—no camera trick—until beyond recapture. He is joined in the mountains by peasants in revolt and finally consents to lead them in battle.

Tell's nature appears to be one without ferocity, but he finally slays Gessler in cold blood, ambushing the tyrant on the castle road. This act weighs on his mind to such an extent that he dreads telling of it to his family after the war is over and peace once more reigns through the land. He confesses it as he would a crime, but he succeeds in justifying the murder as committed for the sake of those he loves.

This is his last act of war. Having rid his uneasy conscience of self-blame by confession, he goes alone to the mountain top, and lays his crossbow down forever where no man may find it. His love of peace is symbolic of that which characterizes Swiss people to-day. His love of liberty is that which characterizes our own people. There is no doubt that such a remarkable character existed and he is splendidly impersonated in the visualization, "William Tell."

British Notes.

THE week's event has been the annual dinner of the moving picture industry. This is quite distinct from the similar functions promoted respectively by the Manufacturers, Renters and Exhibitors' Association, and is in reality the most representative gathering of the industry on our side. Close upon five hundred people attended, "Pop" Lubin arriving from New York just in time to be present. Other American agents to the number of thirty were also present. J. H. Balfour Browne, K. C., presided, and in proposing the success of the industry briefly reviewed its progress since it was a toy. He aptly compared the kinematograph to the evolution of the gyroscope and kite. Both began as toys but now their principles were used in locomotion and aviation. J. F. Brockliss called upon Mr. S. Lubin to respond and the latter remarked that in his rush to get to the dinner he caught an autodriver who directed his attention to a broken lamp on his car. As he had no time to quarrel he paid for a new lamp and got here pleasantly surprised to see such a big company. Twenty years ago he made a film twenty feet in length and people thought it wonderful. But since then the business had grown and he always tried to make the finest films in the trade; he looked to all in the trade to help him. He did not want to be an inventor again. He fought his patent case a good many years ago and spent all his money on it. He went away from Europe as a poor mechanic and a working man and he earnestly hoped that the working man in this country might soon be able to enjoy the picture theater on Sunday.

The first Australian "cowboy" picture arrived on these shores a few days ago from the Lincoln-Cass studios in the Antipodes. The first release, "The Two Bushmen," a two thousand-footer, is dated for May 25 and early reports from the British selling agent report that bookings will be exceptionally good.

Last week at the New Gallery Kinema in London a French inventor, M. Pierre Ulysse, demonstrated a perfected process of moving color pictures. Several prominent men in the trade who attended pronounced the results as marvelous and, although specifications of the process have not been divulged, the two salient features claimed for it are that it can be easily adapted to any projector and requires only the same illumination as monochrome films. The first picture taken by this process was a severe test for any color process, the Battle of Flowers at Nice carnival, but developed with such clarity that it is being already exhibited to the public in London.

Sigmund Lubin accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Ira Lowry, arrived on Tuesday on the Lusitania, but has now left for Paris. He visited quite a number of friends during his few days' stay. It is understood that while in the French capital he will select a site for a new Lubin studio.

Charles Urban, the Kinemacolor magnate, has taken the Holborn Empire Theater in London to show his feature "The World, the Flesh and the Devil." The U. S. A. rights of this feature have been bought by the James McEnnery Syndicate.

For educational picture exhibitors or, in fact, on any occasion where it is desirable to keep a moving picture film stationary for a few moments while the lecturer explains some point of interest to his audience, an invention of Messrs. Lamm will be most acceptable. This firm announces that all projectors sold will be fitted with an electrical connection and the lecturer upon pressing the button makes the film stationary in the gate. At the same time an electric fan is set in motion directing a strong current of air at the film thus avoiding fire. A light of forty emperes was directed for four hours on a film so "fanned" but no blistering or effects of heat was traceable.

Avalanches to order is the newest sensation for the spectacular scenes in a drama being produced by a European house. A corps of cameramen are now in the Swiss Alps with their cameras stationed on the treacherous slopes of the Bernese Oberland. At given signals the cameras will be started and powerful mines will be exploded under huge falls of snow. Then the avalanche will start upon its downward course, that is, providing all the pre-arranged details come off as expected. All that I can add in alternation is that the company have specially insured their staff and apparatus.

J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

Blache Forms New Company.

Will Be Known as United States Amusement Corporation and Will Make Big Features.

UNDER the name of the United States Amusement Corporation, Herbert Blaché, president of the Exclusive Supply Corporation, and Blaché Features, Inc., has formed a $500,000 company for the production of large feature photodramas. Besides Mr. Blaché, the directors of the company are Madame Alice Blaché, president of the Solax Company; Joseph M. Shear, Charles D. Lithgow, Joseph Borries, Henri Menessier and Jules E. Brulatour.

The Blaché picture producing plant in Fort Lee, N. J., has recently been enlarged by the addition of a new factory which is said to be one of the most perfectly equipped for the developing and printing of film of any in the United States. The old factory is rapidly being remodeled to furnish space for dressing rooms, offices, etc., and the new features will be produced in the Fort Lee plant under the direct supervision of President Blaché.

The product of the new company will be pretentious photodramas of five or more reels in length, picturized from well-known plays and novels. The first feature which is already well underway, will be the well-known English star, Mr. Tom Terriss, and his Charles Dickens' Associate Players in "The Chimes." Herbert Blaché is staging the picture dramatization of this famous novel in collaboration with Mr. Terriss, who is a noted student of Dickens' works, and has appeared in his own adaptations of "A Christmas Carol," "Cricket on the Hearth," "Oliver Twist" and "Nicholas Nickleby," all over the English speaking world.

Mr. Terriss, who is perhaps most widely known for his wonderful characterization of "Scrooge" in "A Christmas Carol," is a son of the late William Terriss of Sir Henry Irving's great Lyceum Theater Company.

Realizing the importance of the correctness of character drawings and stage settings for the successful production of one of Dickens' novels, Mr. Terriss has surrounded himself with a company that is experienced in interpreting the famous authors' works and is also using his valuable collection of Dickens' relics, which includes watchmen's rattles and truncheons of the period of 1840, Georgian bellows, foot warmers, candle snuffers, chestnut roasters, warming pans, pewter tankards, candlesticks and a hundred and one interesting articles known to all lovers of the author's stories.

The cast of "The Chimes" is headed by Mr. Tom Terriss, who interprets the character of "Trotty Veck," and is supported by his brother, William Terriss as "Mr. Fish," Alfred Hemming as "Alderman Cute," Robert Harvey as "Fern," Cyril Bidoulph as "Richard," Herbert Vivian as "Sir Joseph," Herbert Cripps as "Tugby," Eliza Mason as "Mrs. Tugby," Faye Cusick as "Meg" and the little Solar star, Vinnie Burns, as "Lillian."

President Blaché has closed a number of important contracts for Broadway theatrical successes and well-known stars to be produced in the near future. The Solax Company and Blaché Features, Inc., will not be affected by the activities of the new concern, but will continue to confine their offerings to one four-reel photodrama released every two weeks as in the past, while the United States Amusement Corporation will present only large special productions at intervals depending upon the length of time that is consumed.

PHOTOPLAY AUTHORS' LEAGUE INCORPORATED.

The Photoplay Authors' League of America held its first annual meeting at Los Angeles, Cal., April 10. Many members were present. The formality of incorporation was gone through with. Richard Harding Davis and Ernest A. Dench, the latter of London, were elected vice-presidents. Checks were received to the amount of nearly $300. It was decided to publish a monthly bulletin, the editors to be Frank A. Smith, Marc E. Jones and W. M. Ritchey. The constitution was adopted, and a seal ordered designed and printed. A resolution was passed authorizing the secretary and treasurer to be paid their office expenses, and a fund for stationery, etc., was allowed. The secretary was ordered to write a letter of thanks to the Ohio representative, Willis, for his good work in getting the copyright bill before the house. The California representative, William D. Stephens, and Senator John D. Works will be urged to help this bill along. After the minor business had been attended to, the league adjourned until next April, when the second annual meeting will be held.

A good laugh came when one of the members made a motion like this: "I move you that we hold the annual meeting more than once a year." Much laughter resulted and the person who made the motion withdrew it, amended it, and resubmitted it. It did not carry.

"The Staircase of Death."

The Gaumont Company Shows a Three-Part Crook Picture Containing Thrilling Situations.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Gaumont Company released on April the 25th a three-part story of a crook-murderer masquerading in good society. "The Staircase of Death" has as a sensational factor a staircase that upon the pulling of a cord swings upon a pivot, plunging a victim into the depths below and to probable death. It is not a love story, although one young woman of charming personality portrayed a character that for some considerable period labored under the delusion that it was. Sybil is a niece of Admiral Trent, retired; the two are spending a few weeks at a Paris hotel. Jack Burgess, an adventurer, in league with Sybil's companion, contrives the detention of Sybil for shoplifting and then secures her release without arrest. Sybil falls in love with the good-looking man who has been so kind to her and meets him clandestinely as well as openly.

Scene from "The Staircase of Death" (Gaumont).

Burgess, through Sybil, invites to his house Mr. Pascal, an art collector. The visitor is dropped down the staircase and killed. Sybil is told that Pascal has departed in a hurry. When next day the girl reads of the finding of Pascal's body in the Seine she is suspicious. Her fears are confirmed when she receives a note from Burgess for her to let him into her house late that night. When he appears he demands the keys to the admiral's safe, threatening Sybil with exposure to her uncle. Sybil yields and Burgess robs the safe and escapes. Parker, a detective called into the case, finds a clue that leads straight to Sybil. When he receives a note from Burgess the detective follows her, shows his detective badge to a chauffeur, and changes cap and coat with the driver. Parker forces an entrance into the house of Burgess, and when he attempts to save Sybil from the thief, who has received from her a thousand dollars on the promise of returning her letters, Parker is dropped down the oubliette. His coat catches and saves him from the straight fall. With his knife he gets loose and goes to the bottom, shaken but not seriously hurt. He escapes by jumping into the river alongside.

The detective awaits the appearance of the crook. In his room he rigs a dummy, sitting at a table. When Burgess enters the room after climbing the drain pipe he swings a blackjack on the figure. As he does so the detective captures him and turns him over to the police. Sybil has her compromising letters returned to her, and the detective assures her that she will not appear in the case, and furthermore that her uncle will be none the wiser. Just how Parker will secure the conviction of Burgess without the testimony of Sybil does not appear.

The picture is well made and there is an excellent cast. It interests and in the final part will thrill. The young woman who portrays Sybil is a new-comer apparently and her name is not known in the New York office of the Gaumont Company, but we may be sure that she will be heard of again. She photographs splendidly; she has more than her share of good looks and, what is better, she also possesses acting sense.

George Stanley.

THE latest addition to the big corps of expert production directors of the Universal Company is George Stanley, formerly with the Pathe, the Vitagraph and the Lubin companies, and for the past twenty-five years prominently identified with dramatic, operatic and musical comedy productions of the country. Mr. Stanley has taken over the Universal-Powers company, of which Miss Edna Maison is leading woman and Ray Gallagher the the leading man.

George Stanley.

In point of experience Mr. Stanley rates as one of the veterans of the motion picture business. In addition to being a producing director of unusual abilities, he also is a player of much experience and diversified talents. For the present at least, he will confine himself to directing only, working on the basis that the viewpoint of the onlooker and expert critic is primarily essential to the success of motion picture plays.

Mr. Stanley started out in life twenty-five years ago in San Francisco as a boy choirister. Possessed of an unusually good tenor voice, he soon won recognition. His first theatrical engagement was as a soloist in the old Haverley's minstrel troupe.

Mr. Stanley's connection with the film producing world commenced seven years ago when he became leading man for the Vitagraph Company. Within a year he was assigned the task of playing leading roles and directing his own company. He remained with the Vitagraph Company for three years and then became director and leading man for the Pathe company. The Lubin company next claimed his services. Mr. Stanley officiating as head production director and playing leads for that concern for a little over a year. He then went back to the Vitagraph Company as director and leading man. He comes from the Vitagraph Company to the Universal.

Apropos of his plans with the Universal Company and the capable galaxy of Powers brand players over whom he will have supervision, Mr. Stanley says: "I intend to produce high-class scripts only. If I cannot get the right kind of plays—plays with real punch to them— I will keep my company idle until I can get such a play. In Miss Edna Maison I think I have one of the most talented of leading women, while other members of my company also are high class players. With them as an asset, the Powers company will produce some real Universal features."

"The Black Triangle."

Five Parts—Exclusive Supply Corporation.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS five-reel production is indeed after the heart of the sensation hunters. At the same time it is a feature of great general merit. Rarely have I seen finer photography than was displayed here by an expert in light effects who seemed to toy by preference with light and shade problems that have been the despair of many a cameraman. Its high quality is well sustained and the interest is kept alive to the very end.

I would not be doing this excellent production full justice if I were to content myself with calling it a detective story. To be sure that is its classification, but it is high above the average detective story. The problem which the detective has to solve in this feature is worthy of the best efforts of Sherlock Holmes at his best.

The daughter of a rich man is mysteriously kidnaped in the peace of her home and in the depth of the night. At first suspicion falls upon the young lover, but when the father receives a demand for ransom it becomes plain that the girl is in the hands of daring criminals. The police are called in and advise that the demand of the blackmailers be complied with and a box containing the money be placed at the side of a wooden bridge out in the country. Behold, just as the police are waiting for the blackmailers to appear and be arrested, a dog runs across the little bridge, swiftly picks up the package and runs away. The police follow and easily trail the dog through the snow, but beyond the snow they cannot follow. It is at this juncture that the aid of the great detective is called in. Webb, the detective, is a man of scientific deductions. He determines by a microscopic test that one of the band wears a gray wig. He draws the fire of the band by advertising for a servant. He succeeds in getting one of the band to apply for the position of butler in his house and then convinces the lover of the kidnaped girl that his guess was correct by watching the disguised crook in an attempt to poison him.

And now begins a battle of wits between detective and crooks such as I have never seen in films before—surprise succeeds surprise,—the unexpected happens and nothing but the unexpected; in one scene the villains seem hopelessly foiled and in the next they become the foilers of the detective. When the escape of the villains seems impossible they get away in an unheard-of manner which sometimes makes our hair stand on end. At other times the detective seems destined to meet the fate of a celluloid rat chased through Hades by an asbestos cat but, or rather BUT, he gets away in some fashion that no one could possibly dream of. The dungeons of the Spanish Inquisition, notoriously the finest specimens of crooked architecture, seem as simple as the pagodas in a summer garden compared to the secret passages, sliding doors, movable walls, plain and fancy trapdoors, peep-holes, death-chambers, false bottoms, etc., etc., in which the villa of the villains abound. Just when we breathe a sigh of relief at the prospect of the rescue of the kidnaped girl down falls the detective into an underground passage filled with water, which is rising with disquieting rapidity. Nor does any such simple expedient as swimming out help him in the least. He can't swim out, but he escapes just the same. Webb descends into a room of the villains through the chimney and one of the villains seems at his mercy but the villain sees the reflection of the detective in the champagne cooler and Webb is foiled. The next moment Webb gets out his new revolver, which is loaded with ether, and calmly puts the villain under anaesthetics. Thus it goes with Fortune smiling and frowning alternately upon the villains and the detective. It certainly is exciting and better still it hardly ever offends the law of probabilities.

Here and there the scrutinizing eye of the gallery gods might find a flaw but on the whole the succession of unusual things done in an unusual way remains well within the probable. One of the biggest sensations in the play comes at the very end and is done in an extremely clever and original way. It works out the detective's theory of the man with the gray wig. All ends happily except for the three rogues. These constituent members of "The Black Triangle" are rushed off to jail.

Bruce McRae to Famous Players.

Prominent Star Will Be Featured In a Big Political Drama by Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady.

The Famous Players Film Company have secured Bruce McRae, who will shortly be presented in the popular romance of love and politics, "The Ring and the Man," by Cyrus Townsend Brady. The commanding personality and splendid poise of Mr. McRae fit him peculiarly for the role of Gormley, the man whose bravery and self-possession in the face of crucial circumstances enable him to successfully oppose the corrupt forces of the gigantic political ring that is trying to ruin him. Gormley's real name is Fordice, but the shadow of crime which hangs over his past has caused him to change it to Gormley, by which name he is known to his business associates and the public, who respect him as a great merchant-prince and reform candidate for mayor. Back of Gormley's ambition is a good and beautiful woman, Eleanor Haldane, whose father is owner of the Gotham Traction Company, a powerful corporation which has always controlled the city's administration. The Gotham company and Gormley become involved in business complications, and Gormley, seeing the evilness of the city politics, partly through a desire to destroy the power of the Gotham company and partly to realize Miss Haldane's faith in him, decides to enter the mayorality race, and is soon far in the lead of the Gotham company's candidate.

Another woman in Gormley's life—a woman of the past—now tries to regain her power over Gormley, and failing, takes the great secret of his former life to the chief of police, who is a tool of the Gotham company. The chief calls on Gormley and threatens to expose him unless he withdraws from the race. Gormley courageously refuses and sends a statement to the papers giving the true facts of the case and the attempted bribe on the part of the chief. Haldane is informed of this development by the chief of police, and knowing of Gormley's love for his daughter, urges her to offer herself as wife to Gormley if he will cease his fight against the Gotham company. Loving her father, and wishing to test Gormley, Elizabeth does this, and is both pleased and grieved when Gormley sacrifices even his love for his principles, and refuses to be bribed even with the gratification of his greatest wish. How the shadow of his crime in the past is lifted from him, how he defeats the vicious ring forces and finally wins his election and his bride, is dramatically visualized in this gripping story.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

IN AN editorial, under the heading, "No Censorship," the Chicago Tribune recently treated of the Holbrook Blinn incident, in which Art, as Mr. Blinn conceives it, collided with the Chicago police. As censorship of the drama and of moving pictures may be placed in the same class, so far as mature minds are concerned, the editorial, in part, as given herewith, will be worthy of careful scrutiny:

Mr. Blinn, confronted with a police order for suppression, exclaimed that if censorship were to be established, it might at least be intelligent. A police sergeant, Mr. Blinn is convinced, is not an intelligent agent in this respect.

"A censorship committee," said Mr. Blinn, "should be composed of intelligent, well read, experienced men or women. Now, my idea would be to have men chosen from every walk of life—a university professor, an artist, a minister, a doctor, an alderman, a playwright, and so on. No one minds being judged by peers or equals, but it is this criticism of genius or talent by uncomprehending minds that galls."

What Mr. Blinn suggests has the distinction of being worse than the police method against which he protests. The occasional blundering intervention of the police, whether with or without justification, is to be preferred to the establishment of a censorship.

The temptation ever present with the censor is to censor. That is his office and that is his duty. His reasoning is simple and disastrous. He's a censor, therefore, he must find something to bring under his authority; something to refuse license, to expugate, to drive out. If he does not prove that he is standing between society and a contaminating influence he offers himself as evidence that he is not needed. It is not the habit of bureaucracy to prove that its services are dispensable.

There would be established an active, aggressive agency of suppression. The police act when it is brought to their attention that a production is offensive to decency and morals. Frequently they blunder. Frequently they are as uncomprehending as Mr. Blinn says they are, but they are less dangerous to freedom within the limits set for freedom than a board of censors would be.

Censorship elsewhere, whatever it might prove to be here, has been largely an attempt at the limitation of intelligence. In Great Britain it is the ludicrous but stubborn target for the scorn of the best minds in the country. Its ineptness is amazing and its prohibitions ridiculous, and with singular certainty it sees viciousness in plays which are honest and virtue in productions which are inherently vicious.

Where and when has censorship of productions for mature minds been intelligent?

In the case of moving pictures most of the best minds in the manufacturing end are agreed that wise censorship for minors is necessary, in the best interests of the business itself. Even at this stage of moving pictures, when there is a strenuous, healthy competition among manufacturers to excel, were the ban of censorship removed a horde of irresponsible freebooters—caring nothing for morals or social uplift and all for the dollar—would flood the country with subjects that would speedily ruin the industry.

Fine Arts Theater Added to Picture Houses.

Charles C. Curtiss, vice-president and managing director of the Fine Arts building corporation, issued a statement Saturday, April 18th, denying reports that the Studebaker Theater had been leased to Jones, Linick & Schaefer for moving pictures and vaudeville entertainments.

"It is true that high-class moving pictures will be shown during May, June, July and August in the Studebaker Theater," he said, "but no vaudeville performances will be given. On September 1st the theater will resume its wonted place and policy in amusement affairs. Also the Fine Arts Theater has been leased to Alfred Hamburger for similar moving picture entertainments, and on October 1st it will revert to its usual activities."

Prices for both houses have been fixed from 25 cents to $1, according to the announcement.

Under an arrangement with William A. Brady, the first of the photoplays will be shown at the Fine Arts Theater in about two weeks. Mr. Hamburger plans showing dramas, comedies and tragedies, acted by celebrated players, in pictures.

Little more than two years ago there were sixteen flourishing high-class theaters in the Loop district. To-day the legitimate stage claims only eight of them, the others having been transformed, temporarily at least, into moving picture houses or vaudeville.

The following have been taken over: Colonial, McVicker's, La Salle, Ziegfeld, Princess, Studebaker and Fine Arts. The Lyric has become the Hippodrome.

"Traffic in Souls" Has Private Exhibition.

About 700 people—chiefly ministers, members of women's clubs and others interested in moral uplift—attended a private exhibition of "Traffic in Souls," by invitation, at the American Music Hall, this city, Wednesday, April 15th. This subject by the Universal has been refused a permit by the board of censors, and pressure is being exerted to have it passed.

At the end of the fifth reel, cards were passed about and those present were asked to vote on whether or not they believed the censor board should reverse its decision and permit the production of the white slave film in Chicago. Only 356 availed themselves of the privilege and only 37 of them voted no. The management seemed pleased with the result and announced it would again seek a permit from the censorship board.

"The film is an exaggerated view of red light life, but well produced and with absolutely no suggestiveness," says the Chicago Tribune, in a review. "Those who came to be shocked were disappointed. There isn't a shock in the entire six reels. There are plenty of thrills, however, and the remarkable work of Detective Burke, who, single-handed, raids a bagnio, rescues any number of 'white slaves,' and arrests the 'slavers,' roused the house to violent hand-clapping.

"Considerable space is devoted to the various methods of luring girls to the underworld—at railroad stations, wharves and city shops. Aside from this warning to unsophisticated feminine moving picture fans, the film has no special mission other than furnishing good entertainment as a well-put-on melodrama."

Conditions in Omaha and Sioux City Very Promising.

E. R. Pearson, of the Omaha Branch of the General Film Company, writes me that R. V. Huth, former manager of the Lyric Theater, Minneapolis, is now manager of the Grand in Sioux City, Ia., and that he is getting his service from the Omaha Branch.

The Grand opened two weeks ago, and Mr. Huth wrote Mr. Pearson as follows, regarding the outlook: "Things here in Sioux City look very favorable. We have the best people of the city coming and I have no doubt but that we can keep them coming if we hold the standard of our shows up to the opening one. We are running exactly on the order of the Lyric in Minneapolis. In fact, our stage setting is an exact duplicate of the one they are using. The theater is decorated throughout with palms and artificial flowers, combined with a system of inverted lighting. I am using the best singers and entertainers I can get and a ten-piece orchestra on the stage."

Mr. Pearson also advises me that three suburban theaters are under course of construction in Omaha just now, and that all of them will install first-class equipment. He writes that indications are especially good in that territory for increased patronage for moving picture theaters. In that section it is evident to everyone that moving picture patrons will support only well-equipped theaters which are securing the most efficient service possible.

Louis Brown, manager of the White Palace Theater, 1609 South Kedzie Avenue, this city, paid us a visit last week. Mr. Brown seemed highly pleased with the volume of his business. He uses Licensed service and charges five cents admission, except on Saturdays and Sundays, when ten cents is charged. The White Palace, which is owned by Abe Ostrowsky, seats 740 people. Mr. Brown formerly owned the Pilsen Theater, nineteenth Street and Blue Island Avenue, which he ran for seven and one-half years.

H. A. Hill, owner of the Star Theater, 1415 Fullerton Avenue, this city, called at THE WORLD office last week. Mr. Hill ran "The Reform Candidate," a Majestic three-reel feature, Tuesday, April 14th. Clara Byers, one of Majestic's Broadway favorites, who appeared in one of the leading roles, chanced to be in the house at the time, and saw the entire show. Mr. Hill was not present, or he would have invited her to the stage and introduced her to the audience. The Star runs mixed programs of Universal and Mutual, and is doing very good business. An admission of five cents is charged for four reels.

Miss Pagel lives at 1175 Waveland Avenue, and is employed as clerk in the popcorn store of Holly Havens, next door to the theater. She was too poor to pay a lawyer, but an attorney in court volunteered to serve her without charge.

Health Commissioner George B. Young directed the police department last week to close the Jewel Theater, 522 West Division Street, because of insufficient ventilation. Investigators for the health department reported that the carbon dioxide content of the air in the theater was as high as 34 points. The ordinance allows 12. A new ventilating system will be required.

Mme. Tetrazini the famous opera singer, is credited with preventing a panic in Canton, O., one afternoon last week. The draperies over the exit in a moving picture theater caught fire, and a stampede was made by the audience. Mme. Tetrazini, who was present, urged the excited people to take their time; but no attention was paid her until she began to sing one of her concert selections. Although no one knew her, the magic of her voice held them until ushers had put out the fire.

EDISON TO PRODUCE "FANTASMA."

The Edison company has acquired the filming rights to the Hanlon Brothers' celebrated extravaganza, "Fantasma," which was played in every town in the country that boasts a theater. It simply swept the country, ranking with "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "The Old Homestead" as a popular classic.

The fantastic effects and trick scenes lend themselves to perfect photographic reproduction. Charles M. Seay will produce the film in which one of the Hanlon Brothers will appear in his original part. The present plan is to give the entire production, which will probably require five reels.

KATHERINE F. CARTER, INC.

In a previous announcement published in the Moving Picture World, Mrs. Katherine F. Carter intimated that it was her intention to open an office in New York for the purpose of providing a motion picture service for church and club entertainments. She now announces the formation of the Katherine F. Carter, Inc., Educational and Motion Picture Service Bureau, with offices at 171 Madison Avenue, New York. Mrs. Carter will arrange and manage motion picture entertainments for clubs, hotels and private residences and will supply a complete equipment to churches, schools and educational institutions.

Having had charge of the educational department of the General Film Company prior to forming the new company, Mrs. Carter is probably better posted on the whereabouts of good educational subjects than any one connected with the motion picture business. Energy, enterprise and an engaging personality should win success for her in this new undertaking.

THE PROOF OF THE PUDDING.

Editor Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir: I wish to congratulate you on the fairness and good faith toward both the exhibitor and manufacturer that you show in the criticisms on films each week. This is especially true of the special features. Speaking for exhibitors in this part of the country I am glad to say that we are depending more and more each week on what the Moving Picture World has to say about a feature.

Work well done is worthy of praise and you are certainly entitled to a lot of credit. Hoping that the Moving Picture World will continue to prosper and be our eyes, I am,

Cordially yours,

"By Power of Attorney."

Strong Photodrama in Three Parts Released by the Features Ideal—An Interesting Story Well Told.

FEATURES IDEAL is releasing upon the state right plan a particularly strong and interesting photodrama entitled "By Power of Attorney," which will appeal to the lover of good pictures. A singularly good story well depicted places this subject among the best of the week's productions and should win for it a wide sale. The portrayal is excellent and the settings are well chosen, many of them beautiful. The photography throughout is good so that there is little to be desired.

We have said that the story is good; it is consistent and properly constructed to create and hold the interest. The principal character is Jack Hilton, a young naval lieutenant who is in love with Adriana Duncan, a beautiful trainer of animals. Jack has an old uncle whose vast wealth he is to inherit, but the uncle promises to cut him off if he should dishonor the family name by marrying a mere circus performer. This threat does not daunt Jack or turn him from his purpose, and the marriage is celebrated. The old uncle hears of the affair and proceeds to carry out his threat, but the hand of Death is laid upon him while he is in the act of making a new will and his estates go to Jack.

Scene from "By Power of Attorney" (Features Ideal).

The young lieutenant does not learn of his windfall until he has embarked on a Government expedition to the interior of India to discover the source of the Sacred River. He is obliged to leave his young bride at home and, on his way to his ship he meets an old friend to whom he trusts the management of his affairs while away.

The trusted friend proves false from the first. He installs himself as a servant in the home of Jack Hilton and intercepts the power of attorney Jack sends to his wife. Armed with this he secures control of the estates of Jack's uncle and uses the money for his own advancement to the utter disregard of his friend's wife.

The expedition of which the lieutenant has charge meets with disaster. It is attacked by natives and all but Jack are killed. He is brought before the rajah and condemned to death. The rajah's daughter, a very beautiful girl, pleads for him and he is cast in prison instead only to be ordered to the lions later. Again the rajah's daughter comes to his rescue and he is allowed to escape, making his way as best he can to civilization.

While these things are happening to Jack, his traitorous friend, not satisfied with having stolen Jack's fortune, determines to possess his wife, now reduced to poverty by the long absence of her husband and compelled to go back to the circus to support herself and child. Trevalny, which is the name of the false friend, attempts to force his attentions upon Mrs. Hilton and is repulsed, being driven from the house by the entrance of one of the tame leopards which the woman keeps near her as a pet. Furious at his failure Trevalny buys the circus and then tells Mrs. Hilton that she must accede to his demands or be driven upon the streets. She goes to plead with him.

About this time Jack returns home and, finding the letter, follows his wife to Trevalny's house, arriving in time to save her from the villain's assault. Jack, in his rage, would have settled accounts with his traitorous friend at once, but his wife restrains him and calls the police who take Trevalny in charge and the reunited husband and wife are left to enjoy their happiness.

Our sympathies are aroused at once for the beautiful wife, at once deprived of her husband's protection and left to the tender mercy of a false friend. The villainies of Trevalny also arouse a desire to contribute to his downfall. Add to this a fear for the fate of Jack among the fanatical natives of India whose sacred things he has defamed and our interest is sufficiently aroused.

According to the rule Jack should have engaged in an affair with the rajah's daughter, but the producers have spared us the spectacle of the faithless husband, and Jack returns the hero still. 'Twas as well, though the temptation must have been great. It might have been made a bit clearer why this incident did not happen and then we would have the better understood how the interest of the rajah's daughter came to be enlisted in Jack's behalf. However, the picture is good as it stands and will please.

"The Python Robbery."

Four Parts—I. S. Plaut Co.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature has many points of great merit while its faults are so trifling as to be negligible. There is no doubt that it will have a big run. It stands the test of criticism well. There is a good, strong and simple plot, there is genuinely dramatic action, the acting is above reproach, there is the added attraction of novelty while the settings are splendid and unique. The photography is generally good, though in one or two scenes the perspectives were a bit dim and hazy.

"The Python Robbery" is in the better sense of the word a detective story. It is daringly original and never inconsistent or improbable. Two men who live alternately by their wit and their violence have learned that a famous opera singer will play her part with all her famous jewels on her person. They hire a room in a building opposite the dressing room of the opera singer and rig up a pole at the end of which they fasten a mirror. By means of this mirror they are enabled to watch every movement of the singer and the maid in the dressing room. The singer has returned from the stage and has taken off her jewels when the robbers decide to act. They have a horrible ally. Their ally is a huge python which they suspend from the pole in such a manner that the head of the snake protrudes through the portieres of the singer's dressing room. At the sight of the monster both singer and maid promptly faint and the thieves take away the jewels.

The pursuit of the guilty men by the detective is very much different from pursuits of that kind, the trail leads to London and then to Paris and back again to London. We see the real Paris, the famous spot on the Rue de la Paix where English and Americans "most do congregate." The Continental Express from London to Folkestone figures in the picture, likewise a real airship racing with the train. I liked the climax of the picture best of all, it was skilfully prepared and the whole thing was logical and satisfying.

A young boy with a most engaging personality and of a pleasing English type shares the honors of heroism with the detective. His rescue of the "tec" from the crushing coils of the python was exceedingly clever.

"The Pawns of Destiny."

In a Three-Part Victor Subject Florence Lawrence and Matt Moore Do Work That Makes Deep Appeal.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Universal Company will release on May 8th "The Pawns of Destiny," a three-reel product of the Victor Studio. The story is written and directed by H. L. Solter. It is a convincingly told tale of those in humble circumstances, of struggle on the part of a man, of love which she dared not reveal on the part of a little slavey; of her bravery in rescuing from death this man, of her self-sacrifice and self-abnegation in supporting a blind man, and of his self-renunciation in turn when he refuses to permit an officious landlady to force a marriage of a man incapable of supporting even himself on to a woman in spite of her willingness. There is deep human appeal throughout—in the second reel especially there is a pull on the heart-strings that to some may be at times uncomfortable.

Florence Lawrence has the role of Sarah, a slavey in a boarding house of the most unpretentious sort. Living here is Robert Brandt, a young lawyer without clients, portrayed by Matt Moore. Sarah shows, in many definite feminine ways, her affection for the man who is so absorbed in his studies that he never gives her a look—to all appearances he is unconscious of her presence. When she cleans his room her vigorous attention is concentrated on the things most closely associated with him. She dusts and redusts his chair, she polishes the covers of the books over which he pours and which she vainly tries to comprehend. When Robert, in his effort to coax a flame uses in the little cylinder stove oil from his lamp and sets fire to the house, it is Sarah who forces her way up the stairs of the great tenement house and drags Robert down a flight of stairs, where the firemen find the two in a heap.

Sarah visits Robert in the hospital, where she learns that he is blind and his hands badly burned. Gordon, Robert's partner, tells the injured man the story of the rescue and of Sarah he says: "This is our little heroine." Sarah appeals to the landlady to let her bring Robert back to the house, stipulating that she will work for nothing. The agreement is made and put into effect, but when the woman of the house discovers slight but none the less significant evidence of affection between the two she informs Robert that she will immediately bring in a clergyman to marry them. Robert's protests are unheeded. Sarah, mistaking his attitude, is disconsolate. While the landlady is gone on her righteous mission Gordon enters with word of a legacy for Robert. A marriage takes place, but it is by a clergyman of Robert's selection.

Some of the best situations in the picture are those in the new home. Sarah can't keep still. She must be working. She enters the model kitchen, to the dismay of the cook. She conceives a fondness for the attire of one of the maids and has herself arrayed in the same manner. There are dramatic scenes surrounding the operation upon Robert's eyes. While the surgeons are at work Sarah sits at the foot of the stairs and waits. Her pathetic attitude will strike deep into the souls of the many followers of the picture who have experienced similar hours of trial—but Sarah has as an added weight the fear of what her husband will say and do when he sees her for the first time. Robert in his impatience disregards the injunctions of the surgeons and tears from his eyes the bandage. He seeks his wife. As he passes Sarah in her maid's garb she falls weeping into a chair. When the husband is told that his wife is in her room he shuts his eyes, he puts his hand on the face of the woman he locates there—and recognizes her. What happens then settles any doubts in the mind of Sarah.

It is all a pretty story and an absorbing one. It is well staged. One of the most effective settings is the operating room and the showing of the surgeons at work in the single shaft of light that pierces the absolute darkness. The elaborate kitchen will interest the feminine side of any house. It is a detail, but not a minor one. The fire in the big tenement house, with the fleeing tenants and the entering firemen, is vividly portrayed. Charles Craig, who plays Gordon, is excellent in his characterization. It will be noticed that in Miss Lawrence's interpretation of the slavey there is an absence of the lightness of foot which is one of her characteristics; in its stead there is the stiff-jointed gait of the drudge.

W. H. Turner.

THE union between the dramatic stage and the cinematograph studio is becoming closer every day. The ablest stage players are finding wider scope on the screen for their talents than they have known behind the footlights. An instance of this condition is found in William H. Turner, who is the latest addition to the powerful Lubin organization. For sixteen years Mr. Turner played under the Frohman management, scoring in the Frohman successes, "Held by the Enemy," "The Fatal Card," "The Prisoner of Zenda," "Sowing the Wind," "Because She Loved Him So," "The Girl from Mixims," etc. In addition to his wide experience as a leading character actor, Mr. Turner is one of the few picture players who have starred in the spoken drama. Mr. Turner headed his own company in "David Harum," "Father and the Boys" and "The Governor and the Boss." He brings to the screen all the artistry of a man who has proven himself in hundreds of roles a master of character portrayal. Mr. Turner, while one of the latest recruits to the silent drama, was also one of the first. Seven years ago when there were fewer actors on the screen, he accepted a short summer engagement. Consequently, when Mr. Lubin assigned him a few months ago to the direction of Joseph Smiley, he had not the usual difficulty of adapting his technique to the demands of the camera. Mr. Turner's vigorous, finished acting will shortly be seen in coming Lubin releases, "The Root of Evil," "The House of Darkness," "The Better Man," "The Trunk Mystery," etc.

EVERY manufacturer around here is wearing a broad smile that cannot be rubbed off. The reason is that Old Sol has been with them ever since the 24th of February, and not a rainy day has marred film activities. Only one day of light rain, and that was on Saturday, has stopped work, and the forecaster predicts fair weather from now on.

The Fred Mace Feature Film Company has started work at the old Majestic studio on the east side of the city. Fred will direct one company as well as appear in the comedies that are being arranged especially for him. Harry Revere is directing another company. Fred will appear in both comedies. Revere is a director of knowledge, and he promises some new and original work. Bert Longnecker will preside at one camera and will also have charge of the laboratories. Marguerite Loveridge, who has been seen with Mace in former pictures, will be in the company as will Carrie Clark Ward, who has done much comedy work. Sydney de Grey will be there with his laughable personality and will, in addition to taking part in the pictures, be known as business manager.

The company is assured of good releases, having already arranged for a European as well as an Australian and African market for the films. This studio is one of the finest in the South, having large stages, well appointed offices and roomy dressing rooms, besides plenty of room for scene work and stage manager's quarters. The laboratories are large and up-to-date in every way. Work has started on comedies, but drama will be done later.

Otto Lederer, who for so long a time has been seen in numberless character roles in Vitagraph films, has severed his connections with the Western branch and has joined Thomas H. Ince at Bronchoville, where he will hereafter be seen in brands of the New York Company. He played a most wonderful character part in Captain Alvarez, the five-reel Vitagraph feature. He was the old ambassador, and his difficult work was much complimented. He will now be with his wife, Gretchen Lederer, who is also with the Broncho players.

Mary H. O'Connor, who was photoplay editor, reader, and publicity manager for the Vitagraph at Santa Monica, has joined Burton King's company in Glendale, where she will be scenario editor for the soon-to-be-released Usona brand of films.

The work of extending the fire mains and hydrant system to the plant of the Balboa Company, has been rushed and soon the studios will be safe as far as protection goes. "The Valley of the Moon" will be run on Monday evening, the 13th, by Bosworth, at the Los Angeles Athletic Club, being the first time the film has ever been threaded in a public projection machine. Many invitation cards have been issued, and the eight-reel play will be witnessed by all the "high brows." Myrtle Stedman and Jack Conway played the leads. Miss Stedman, who some time ago was cut and bruised when her horse became frightened and dashed into a barbed wire fence, has recovered from the shock, and the bruises and cuts are nearly all healed.

Everybody has been kodaking them since they arrived.

Frank Montgomery, producer of Indian pictures for Glendale Kalem, was near being arrested a few days ago when a burly policeman grabbed him on the street in the evening and wanted to know where he was going to fight with "brass knuckles." Said knuckles being a handsome ring which was presented to "Monty" by Mona Darkfeather and the tribe. The policeman apologized and expressed his admiration of the solid gold ring, surmounted by two generously weighted diamonds set into two heavy elk teeth. The ring weighs about as much as an old-fashioned gold watch.

Miss Alice Rhodes, the charming actress who has been for the past year with Edwin August, is to be married the latter part of May to a young business man of this state. Eddie Dillon is a regular wild animal fancier now. His latest stunt is training a quartette of cinnamon bears in the trick of "not looking at the camera." He succeeded,—not. The bears were placed "on the lines" and as soon as Mr. Cameraman ground two feet of gelatin, the brown fellows took offence and a wild scramble for high places followed. The Majestic studio lost some of its majesty when the playful bruins started ruling. Leading ladies literally flew to their painting rooms, while men in title roles dodged down sky cellars, jumped through rapidly closing doors, and the whole stage force vaulted over fences and "clumb" poles. Not fifteen seconds from the time when the bears started their rampage, was there to be seen a soul around the studio. Magic is no word for it. The owner of the bears soon quieted them, and even then, few actors would venture forth.

Not satisfied with holding the Pacific Mail liner twenty minutes to load on his auto, he made the jolly captain stop the ship and pick up an actor who was thrown from the navigation bridge in a thrilling sea picture. The latest is that six women fainted when an auto went over the Pali and down the steep precipice loaded with dummies. The women saw the originals of the fake humans pass on the high road, and soon after saw the machine plunge over. They thought the people had been killed.

Moving Picture Educator

WIDE-SPREAD USES OF THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURES.

FROM all parts of the country reports are coming in of the extensive use of educational pictures in such a manner as to make it seem that they are almost universal in their adaptability in every sphere of life. It is rapidly becoming an accepted fact that all the great trades must adopt the pictures for the twofold purpose of teaching and increasing the technical knowledge of the trades in the factories, as well as to make public by means of exhibitions the arts and sciences of manufacturing. The commercializing of the products are now largely increased by means of the pictures, assuring a more intelligent knowledge on the part of the buyers.

Pictures of Minnesota Mines for Norway Exposition.

Norwegians of Minnesota are preparing a series of pictures of the mining activities of the state, together with the iron industries, lumbering and farming, with illustrated descriptions of th extensively populated Norwegian settlements. A feature of the mining exhibits will be motion pictures of the mine operations. There will be eight of these reels showing miners at work underground, the hoisting of ore, scenes in and about the various mining locations, and work in the open pits. In addition to these several geological pictures will be prepared showing the formation of the ore throughout the state. Pictures descriptive of the safety appliances used, as well as of the sanitary methods adopted for the benefit of the employees. These pictures are intended to convey to the people of Norway information concerning American mining industries, as well as giving an idea as to how Norwegians in this country are employed and are prospering.

Cleaning up Spokane. The Pictures Aid.

Seven picture houses in Spokane will show "clean-up" pictures in connection with a pre-arranged movement for the cleaning and beautifying of the city. The plan is under the direction of the Health Department, which is using the moving picture to show the people what is required and how it is to be accomplished. Seventeen thousand children will be shown the pictures, and then be instructed to work out the proposed improvements. It is certainly a compliment to the moving picture that by its teaching powers a "City-Beautiful" can be made possible. It is also pleasing to record that exhibitors are here working in harmony with the authorities; under such conditions there are sure to arise many other opportunities for helpful co-operation. That this plan should be continued along other educational lines will not only be good for Spokane but an example to many other cities; if exhibitors will take the hint they may yet prove to what extent they may become leaders in such movements.

Insane and Normal Brains.

Moving pictures of the brains of insane and normal men were shown at the annual meeting of the Medical Association of Pennsylvania. The motion pictures which have been introduced into the study of medicine by the faculty of the University are under the direction of Dr. C. K. Mills and Dr. T. H. Weisenberg. They showed the sluggish movement of the brain of an insane man, as compared with the active movement of the normal brain. The nature and the use of brains, it would now appear, are both possibilities of the moving picture; the rapid advance of medical science is increased by this means. Harvard University is now classed one of the recent converts to the thorough adaptation of the motion picture, like Cornell, they are having a beneficial effect upon the student body, increasing their opportunities for dormitory entertainments, thus decreasing their desires for previous excesses which were one of the curses of college life, besides adding to the greater advantages of the lecture room.

Pictures Judicially Declared to be "Healthful."

In London, England, the Chancery Court was recently called upon to decide a fine point as the moral standing of the moving picture. The case was a motion to restrain the Corporation of Shoreditch from permitting the Hoxton Public Baths from being used as a kinematograph theater. The corporation has found that there was no use for the baths in the winter months, and accordingly had let it for what it was contended was a purpose outside the provisions of the "baths and wash-houses act." The point of the case was whether the purpose was to afford "healthful recreation" which was legitimate. Counsel submitted that a moving picture entertainment did not come within that description. After hearing arguments Mr. Justice Eve said the word "healthful" applied to an entertainment which was wholesome, and provided salutary recreation, was appropriate, he therefore refused to stop the showing of the moving pictures.

Growing Use of Religious Pictures at Easter.

Never before have the newspapers contained notices of so general a use of religious pictures at Easter time as during the last few days. The Moving Picture Educator advised a general use of Easter pictures, and the response has been most thorough and highly satisfactory. From Cleveland, Ohio, comes what appears to be the best report so far. The manager of the Colonial Theater gave the week to the picture entitled "The Life of Our Saviour," and invited the Federated Churches to participate in the movement; this they agreed to do, even to the extent of arranging a schedule whereby a different clergyman was in charge of each afternoon and evening performance. The Rev. E. B. Wright, secretary of the Federated Churches, said at the end of the week: "It is fitting that the churches co-operate with the theaters in the presentation of such pictures at this season of the year; the members of the federation are convinced that the moving pictures properly utilized for the exploitation of religious subjects, will result in much good. This is a result much longed for by the Educator, often suggested to exhibitors, and at last most satisfactorily carried out, even as anticipated with equally good results for clergymen and exhibitor. In Cincinnati likewise, this same series of pictures was shown with the cordial support of the churches. Organ recitals were added, and a quartette from the Cincinnati College of Music led in sacred songs, the audience frequently joining in chorus.

Cardinal Gibbons and St. Patrick.

Cardinal Gibbons, accompanied by many other church dignitaries, recently attended an exhibition of moving pictures depicting the life of St. Patrick, in the Lyola College Hall, Baltimore. The film is a very costly production, written by G. B. Theobald Walsh, and was enacted by 3,000 Irish peasants amid the same scenes portrayed in the life story. The peasants are dressed in ancient Irish historical costumes. Divided into four parts it contains 5,000 feet of film. The first part opens with the baptism of St. Patrick, and is divided into four scenes. Part two shows St. Patrick sold into slavery, and is divided into five scenes. Part three opens with the arrival in France, and the re-union with his mother, followed by the Baal festival, the last dogmatic rite in Ireland; and closes with the death of the famous saint. The Rev. Joseph M. Renaud had general oversight of the exhibition.

St. Patrick's Rectory, at Mount Morris, New York, has purchased a Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motion picture projecting machine through the Auburn Film Company, of Auburn, New York.

A Power's Cameragraph No. 6A motion picture projecting machine has been installed in St. Patrick's Rectory, Jersey City, New Jersey. This machine was sold through J. H. Hallberg, of New York City.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

IN illustrating a skit on "What they say at the movies," Callahan, in the Sunday World, portrays a young man making desperate efforts to simultaneously keep his eyes fixed on the screen and the keys of the piano upon which he is playing. With the illustration the artist supplies this comment: "This is the reason why the music is so bad in most movie places. The pianist must be a contortionist. He can't watch the ivories and pictures at the same time, so when he sees a sad film he plays ragtime." What the artist intended to be funny is really something to which exhibitors should give serious consideration. In the first place the music in most picture houses is declared bad and in the second place the artist, perhaps unintentionally, has assumed the role of sponsor for negligent and irresponsible pianists who have offered the comment made as an excuse when houses have been criticized for not furnishing suitable musical selections for the changing scenes thrown upon the screen. It is a fact that many pianists indulge in the grotesque actions of pancake tossers in the show windows of the Infants' restaurants, but it is not true that the work required of them is responsible for it. Most of the piano players are too busy conversing with friends, or trying to make an impression upon some attractive person in the audience, and miss the changes on the screen. The majority of them cannot offer as an excuse the inability to watch the keys because their stock of selections is so limited and they repeat them so often that the same results could be attained if they played with their eyelids closed. The writer watched a pianist who had her face turned from the screen and conversed with a friend seated in the audience almost during the entire time the picture was on the screen. The heads of many pianists seem to be adjusted very much like those affixed to the figures used by ventriloquists. They are almost capable of complete revolutions when the pianists imagine their playing is the feature of the show and they cast "your kind applause, please" glances to the audience. Some of the players do not care a hang because they are not getting even ribbon counter salaries, and the managers are afraid to kick lest they may be required to raise the ante in making the change. So after boiling the proposition down to the proper consistency we find that the musical end of the shows is up to the exhibitor. While Callahan was only joking, it should be remembered that many a true word is spoken in jest.

William Warner Kirby, who died at Los Angeles, Cal., on the 18th inst. after being attacked by a lioness used in a motion picture production by the Universal Company, was well known in the East. After his return to this country last spring with the Paul Rainey South African expedition people he worked at the Vitagraph plant in Brooklyn and remained there until last October, when he left to seek a field where animal training was more in demand. One of his most intimate friends was Max Sloman, who recently closed with an animal outfit in Florida and is again at the Vitagraph studios. When Max heard of his friend's awful death tears streamed down his cheeks. "Well, I am not surprised," said Max. "Kirby was a big, strong, nervy fellow, and had a lot of animal training experience, but he was over confident. We were together with the Bostock and other animal shows at many places. I often heard Kirby say, when we saw or heard of trainers being attacked by lions, or other animals, 'A man is a fool that lets a lion bite him.' He was so confident that he believed none of the beasts could get a hold on him. His death is a lesson. The element of danger is always present, no matter how well trained the animals may be, or docile they may appear. And the lesson applies to all lines of moving picture work where hazardous undertakings are involved. Nerve and confidence have their limits in all spheres, but caution should be boundless."

A press agent tells of how a leading actress in the motion picture field lived the life of a distressed poor for an entire week in order to get color for a picture in which she was cast. There was a gulping sensation on our part when we read of how the ambitious actress abandoned her Fifth Avenue home and, disguised in rags and a shawl, procured lodgings in a Hester Street garret upon advance payment of nine days' rent at the rate of a Fifth Avenue dollar a month. Tears filled our eyes as we perused that part of the story telling of how the garret was shared by two other women and old pieces of awning were used as bed coverings; and of each of the three chipping in forty cents (why was it not thirty?) with which to secure a four days' supply of meat to be cooked in a large kettle over a charcoal peanut roaster. But when we read that the meat they cooked and ate was five pounds (why was the quantity specified?) of dog bone stew (why did the press agent particularize on bone stew?) meat we were overwhelmed by a sensation far worse than that which seized us when we read of how Capt. Cook stuffed the Arctic inhabitants with gum drops. Give us air! From Fifth Avenue to dog meat! Hey, operator! Flash that "One minute, please" slide.

The attempted humor in this criticism may not be appreciated by our readers; but, considering the matter from a serious standpoint, is it not reasonable to assume that press agents should exercise caution as well as animal trainers? Suppose, in heralding the coming to this country of the great Sarah Bernhardt her press agent had filled the newspapers with narratives of how she attained success in the roles that brought her such great international fame through local color acquired by sacrificing tours in the poverty-stricken parts of Paris, in search of horse meat goulosh? Do you think the divine Sarah could be restrained from giving the agent a knock on the block?

In a picture house located in the lower port of the city one night last week a flashily dressed youth stood against a wall in the space just within the doors leading to the auditorium. In front of him stood three girls, eagerly listening to what the youth was saying. None of the quartette appeared to be much over the age of sixteen. Many observers thought they were younger. The youth was spinning yarns about his experiences as a motion picture actor—and other things. A lady who had overheard part of the conversation, and as a writer takes an interest in the motion picture business, sought the manager of the place and in his absence found the assistant. She suggested that such groupings, and the character of the conversation carried on, was one of the chief incentives for complaints against picture houses by investigators. The assistant manager is described as a rough, uncouth individual, better fitted for manager of a dog fight. "Aw," he exclaimed in answer to the lady, "wot are yer buttin' in fer? Wot der yer expect me ter do? Can't a young feller talk ter his sweetheart widout youse people making a holler? Dats our pianer player taking his supper time off. Don't yer want him to eat?"

The lady reflected for a few moments and then turned upon the ruffian with some spirit, saying, "You may not be your brother's keeper, and you no doubt cannot intervene in that youth's love affairs; but I will give you, or the manager, five minutes in which to clear the passageways of this theater of loiterers."

The fellow's jaw dropped and he stared at the lady, trying to satisfy himself as to whether she was an official, or "one of dem reformers." Turning to go to the group he drawled, "Aw, well, seein' as yer bound to make trouble, I'll tell the kid to beat it, or go back to pound der box." Then he walked away muttering something about some people not being able to mind their own business, but he was not like Huerta.

Suggestion is made that exhibitors be careful that their names and the names of their associations be not used as a cloak for entertainments, balls, picnics, or excursions managed by their employees. It is said that this is contemplated, if it has not already been done. The inference does not apply to the operators. Perhaps the suggestion has been occasioned by a remark dropped by some moving picture people recently, after attending a gathering supposed to be under the auspices of exhibitors. One said, "I was there and the attendance was a good one, but my observations led me to believe that ushers and others were at the head of the affair. I met very few exhibitors."

"BUNNY IN PLASTER."

The De Renca Art Studios, New York, has favored the Moving Picture World with a small plaster statuette of John Bunny in a characteristic pose. It is made with the full permission of the famous Vitagraph star and is on sale at various theaters.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Airdomes.

ALREADY the open air places are being furbished up and the Winter accumulation of dirt and rubbish is being removed. If you have not started on yours and are going to do much, see what you can do.

In the first place tear down the high board fence. Put the screen at the front end of the lot and the machine at the rear. Now throw up an open fence that will let the passerby see how your audience is enjoying the performance and make them your ballyhoo.

For another thing, get your bill boards made so that the board part is separate from the frame. Have the frames lettered "Coming," "Tomorrow" and "Today," and have the board so that you can move board and paper from one frame to the other and the patron can tell from the position of the board which is which.

If you use board benches, have them fixed so that the seat part can be turned over. If it rains the under part of the board gets wet. If you have tip-up seats get tarpaulins, each large enough to cover two or three rows of seats. Drape the seats each night whether it looks like rain or not.

By the entrance gate erect a board large enough to contain the casts of all the plays to be shown, or better still the casts for the day and the day following. This is the day of the favorites. Play them up.

When you build that new fence, build in a couple of gates on either side of the entrance to be used as exits, letting the crowd out quickly. It will help you to get a crowd in, also.

If the chairs are placed directly on the ground instead of on a board flooring, have a few wooden platforms made about eighteen inches square with a handgrip cut in the centre (merely an oval hole for the fingers). Supply these to old and rheumatic persons. Advertise the fact that these will be supplied and get the trade of the old people who are afraid of the effect of damp ground on aching feet. A few lengths of two by four, some old soap boxes and a quart of paint will help a lot to make friends with the old folks, and Grandma may take the kiddies when the mother is too busy.

Box in your screen, but in such a way that it does not hide the view from any seat.

Even if you cannot run a program in the winter, the soda and ice cream advertisements should give you a small profit in the summer.

Any other suggestions will be welcome and we will appreciate novel schemes for placement or advertising of open air theaters.

Wants Suggestions.

Herschel Stuart, publicity man for the Queen Theater, Dallas, Texas, tells of an odd experience. They had "Judith of Bethulia," for a recent day and spent $150 advertising it. He says: "It brought hundreds of people to our door, only to hesitate when they saw the war scenes on the paper, that did not seem to harmonize with the religious story and they beat it up the street to where there was a Keystone comedy. The boss said, 'Biograph or Barnum! one of them is wrong,' so we took down the paper and the people came in."

Now the paper, though vivid, is in excellent taste and thoroughly in harmony with the story and the production. The letter is not given here as a criticism of the paper, for it does not appear that the paper is to be adversely criticized, but merely to show what a little thing will influence a crowd and also to show that the utmost care must be used to catch the temper of the patrons. The story of Judith is the story of the siege of Bethulia, a war story if there ever was one, and assuredly not the only war story contained in the bible. It does not even appear that the advertising of this house unduly featured the religious feature. It was simply that this particular clientele did not feel that the war scenes were in consonance with a religious story, and so they went away until an adroit manager sensed the situation and took in the paper. In other sections, perhaps in the same town, the battle scenes might have attracted where the religious feature would not. It only goes to show that if you would find the greatest success, you must study your own particular audience.

Mr. Stuart asks for personal criticism of some of his advertising. We do not see much to criticize and would not have the time to do this if we did. He writes pulling copy and sees that he gets a good display. You can't do more than that except to send an auto after the audience. The one thing we note and do not like is the program of a sister house that speaks too much of the films and too little about the house, an error we hope Mr. Stuart does not make when he himself comes to this most valuable advertising.

If You Please.

We did not get the last issue of the Academian. We mourn our loss.

Help Wanted.

Although he writes that he is a regular reader of this department, W. S. Osborne has not noticed that we do not preserve programs sent in and asks for a bunch. Since we cannot help Mr. Osborne out, will some of you please send him samples? His address is 60 State Street, Boston, though the house, the Empire, is in Portland, Maine.

Booming Lucille.

We notice from the Spotlight, the program of the Fichtenberg enterprises in New Orleans, that in starting the Lucille Love series there the Times-Piacyune published with the first installment of the story a coupon good for a free admission to the Plaza to see the first section at the film run. This is rather a costly mode of advertising when figured merely in lost admissions, but if it is realized that a lot of new business will be brought in the expense is trifling as compared with results. Since this combination of newspaper and theater is growing increasingly popular, the idea is passed along for others to try. It takes a little nerve to lose the profits of the house for two days, but figure on your possible gain.

We also note that the Dreamworld will be a five cent house seven days a week, with second-run Mutual subjects. The general trend is toward higher, not lower, prices.

Another.

John's Theater News, Jacksonville, Texas, is one of the latest. John Morris, Jr., says that "as time goes on and I get on to the method of getting up copy, I hope to make it as much sought after as the most prominent papers that come into the home."

He makes a good start in the first issue. There is plenty of interesting material about the players and purely paragraph stuff as well. About the only suggestion is that the titles of the plays in the program be set in full face instead of Roman. The text is about right, gossipy and newsy. We will appreciate being put on the mailing list.

Right In Line.

Right in line with what we have been urging comes a small sheet from L. J. Scott, of the Gem, Warrensburg, Mo. It is going to be enlarged when he can get the printer to handle it, but meantime he has a little editorial that will help others:

> Many people are interested in motion pictures. The business has advanced until it is past the experimental stage. Not only that, it is past the stage where the possessor of a few seats, a cheap machine and a worn out film service can cater successfully to your pleasure.
> I want you to get my idea of a first class picture show; what the aim of the management is and why we have adopted the policy we have.
>
> A man grew famous over night by giving his book the title "Pigs is Pigs." I make my bid for notoriety by saying "Films is not films—always."
> Recently I saw films advertised at $3 per reel. Not for rent, but for sale at that price. Think of it, less than half the price we pay for rental of our Daily Service.
> I can furnish you six reels every day for the same price you now see three. I can furnish you ten at no greater cost to myself than the four feature reels you now pay a dime to see on Special Days.
>
> Do you want quantity at a sacrifice of quality?
> I hope not, for you will be disappointed when you patronize the House of Quality.

Mr. Scott also runs straight "plate" photoplay matter in the daily paper three times a week with an underline "Furnished for Photoplay Followers with the compliments of the Gem theater." This is a novel scheme, but practicable only in a small town where the advertising rates are not heavy, unless you can arrange with the editor to share the expense with you.

We are waiting for the enlarged edition.

A Little Old.

The Neptune theater, New Rochelle, is sending out a program in an envelope addressed "For the lady of the house." That is an idea a little too old even for New Rochelle. It would be better to distribute the unenclosed program than to employ this once favorite device of soap makers and breakfast food builders. But here is a good line for a neighborhood theater:

> ? ARE YOU' AWARE ?
> That in your neighborhood within a few minutes walk of your home, there exists a Moving Picture Theater which in every possible respect, stands second to no other Theater of its kind or size in Westchester County?

Perhaps.

Perhaps C. K. Kazanjian meant it when he wrote:

> We are very interested readers of your department and have received many helpful ideas from it.
> We are sending for your criticism of our program for this week which has now been in existence for almost a year. The paper on which it is printed is changed from time to time, as is also the design of the front.
>
> It is a source of pleasure and profit to read your columns in which some get roasted and some have bouquets thrown at them we are going to take a chance at being the "goat" and let some one else profit thereby.
> Let us have all the "knocks" that are coming our way.

And then, again, perhaps he knew that he was sending the rock of the family and a nice family at that. If we moved to New Haven and were looking around for a theater, we think we would give the Garden Theater the "once over" on the strength of the appearance of the program alone.

It is not a large program: it's only four 4½ by 7 pages on a gray paper given a bluish cast through the use of linen fiber. The paper of itself is different—and better—from the average and it gives a good first impress. The display is admirable and the first page gives the name of the house, tells where it is and the times of performance. It is all there where we can see it. Some of it is in four-point gothic, which would be too small were there much used, but too much is not used. That front page is a nice thing to look at just because it is artistic.

On the second page is a brief talk on features. It is worth reproducing:

LITTLE GARDEN CHATS

A Feature Every Day

Keeping pace with the growing and ever improving conditions of the Motion Picture, the Garden Theater announces that each and every day hereafter, there will be a multiple-reel feature on its program.

All over the country there has been a manifest demand for more features; multiple-reel productions of two or more parts of superior merit. And in keeping with this demand, the manufacturers of motion pictures have been making more and more features.

Looking back two years, or about the time the Garden came into existence, we remember that one two-reel feature a week was considered a big thing. That was all we could get then. Today, in our own country alone, more than two dozen features are made every week. Almost every day some new feature producing company is organized and the market is being flooded with features, good, bad, and indifferent.

It would be very easy to give our patrons two, three or more features every day, but the whole thing simmers down to a question of Quality, of Worth-while-ness. Out of this mass of feature productions each week we are selecting six; the six which in our estimation are really worth while.

And following are the features for this week. Each and every one is good; the best in quality that can be had. Look them over, see them and enjoy the good Garden program.

There follows a running story of the coming features with day and date, a full-face side head and underline for each. At the bottom of the last page is the single advertisement the sheet carries, the modestly set announcement of a drug store.

Very probably Mr. Kazanjian meant it when he said he was willing to take the knocks, but he must have known there were no knocks due. It is one of the prettiest pieces of printing that has come into this department since it was started and we think the sender knows enough about good printing to know how good it was. Perhaps he'll send you one if you enclose a stamped and addressed envelope. It's a treat to the eye and the intelligence.

He Got There.

Quite some time ago an "operator and janitor" sent in some samples of his work and we expressed the opinion he should be promoted to be press agent. He writes he is now Operator, Manager and Advance Agent, but he no longer is the janitor.

It seems that an opposition house started that foolish eight-reel show because that was all the manager apparently knew, else he would not have done it. This in Carthage, New York. Claude E. Lindstruth, who manages the Hippodrome with a program of ten to fourteen-day stuff. Instead of losing his head and running nine reels of commercial to beat the other man's junkright he started a campaign of education and writes that he is getting his trade back simply through making people realize that four good reels are better than eight poor ones.

We said that it could be done. Mr. Lindstruth has done it. Anyone else can, too. Here is one of his "bulletins," which is printed on a straight news sheet 9 by 12 inches, printed on one side only:

FACTS CONCERNING MOVING PICTURES NOT FOUND IN THE NEWSPAPERS.

CAN YOU SPARE THE TIME TO-DAY (SATURDAY) to see our Program? The first four reels you will see are MUTUAL PROGRAM, viz: "The Reform Candidate" (3 reels), a timely drama disclosing the methods of crooked politicians, and "Up in the Air Over Sadie."

When you have seen these four reels thrown on the screen, you will have received more value for your money than you are aware of. The age of films governs the rental price of same. Our Mutual Program, of which we show 24 reels per week, four of them being shown every day, are all new pictures. Films that have been in use over the different circuits for two or three months or longer, are then known as Commercial Reels, and cost but one-third the price paid for our films. In other words we could show twelve old reels daily at the same rental that we pay for four new ones. As you watch our new pictures you will observe that there are no dark streaks resembling rain running downward in the picture (this is a sure sign of age), the titles are lengthy, and the film has a clean, healthy appearance, the ending is not abrupt, but gradually darkens and fades away. Pictures of this description are worthy of your patronage. In your wordly travels give your good money to a man who shows this kind of pictures, as you will be getting value received. At the same time your patronage will encourage managers to put up the money demanded by all film exchanges for this class of film. Of late we added four reels of Commercial film to our daily program. Compare the two programs to learn the difference between new pictures and the cheaper ones.

I am giving you this inside information not because our worthy competitor has been using Commercial film, but because the new policy to be developed at this theater demands that you learn much of which has been denied you heretofore.

Look for Bulletin No. 3. It may be of interest to you.

Matinees at 3:00. Evenings at 7:30.

We hope Mr. Lindsthruth will remember his promise to send along the rest of the series as they appear.

Fine!

We wish that every exhibitor would take this stand and mean it. The paragraph is from the Academian, Selma, Ala. The opening of the paragraph speaks of the recent New York craze for slime and filth and goes on:

> We have absolutely no criticism to make of the exhibitors of the film here, we only wish it distinctly understood that the Academy of Music and its present management are unalterably opposed to the exhibition in that theater of pictures built about the so-called "White Slave Traffic" and to impress upon you the fact that pictures of this nature will never be exhibited upon our screen. It is not a matter of morals, but of respect for the business in which we are engaged and of the people to whom we attempt to appeal.
> We believe firmly that there exists here sufficient demand for pictures of ideas exhibited with respect to the better natures of people to make the operation of a theater with that policy profitable, and is this belief which we are following. Neither "white slave" films nor other of ultra sensationalism will be exhibited at the Academy of Music, and if we cannot conduct our business without them, it becomes truly a matter of shame to the city itself and not to us. But our sincere respect for the intelligence and high-mindedness of our fellow townspeople makes us confident of the soundness of this policy.

It is a pity there is not a greater number of managers who can see tomorrow's dollar rather than today's ten-cent piece or quarter.

More From Buhl.

If we do not get some stuff from Buhl, Idaho, about every so often we wonder whether it is a fire or a flood, for Kalina and Sergel seem to run an idea factory there in the Rex Theater. Lately they have been showing the "Villa Mexican War" pictures and they got a fine display in the Buhl papers as well as this handbill:

WAR

In chaotic Mexico, will be shown in motion pictures at the Rex today (Sat., March 14) Matinee and Night. This a chance to see conditions as they are, the picture being taken under an exclusive contract with the Rebel leader, General Villa, whose recent activities prove Gen. Sherman's famous utterance, ——————War is——————

IS

HELL

This is in black on deep red paper. We do not as a rule approve of profanity on billing matter, but the Sherman classic does not count as profanity, and it makes a most striking piece of advertising. The three words are in ten-line letters, the minor text being in ten-point well leaded and with plenty of space between the sections. Someone out here, we think it is W. J. Sergel, has a better-than-usual realization of the value of space and he doesn't try to spill the whole printing office on a five by eight dodger.

Another advertisement carries a useful line. It reads:

These pictures are not the same as shown last night.

With a daily change and frequent dodgers, we think we would keep that line working regularly. It's good, and drives home the fact of the daily change.

They are alive out in Buhl.

Something New.

The Third Street Theater, Easton, Pa., asks for brief criticisms of what its patrons consider the best film of the week and promises to print the three best. If you have the room, remember that all like to see their name in print, and this offer gets them studying the films and realizing what a lot they get for their money. Of course the contributions are signed. Remember the first time you saw your stuff in type? That's how the patrons will feel.

On the other hand we do not see what interest a printing of a recent judicial decision in a dispute between a film exchange and a manufacturer has for the average spectator. Keep this sort of trade item out in favor of the gossip about films and film players. No one cares that an exchange man bested a manufacturer. Most of them would not know what an exchange is. Put in the stuff that counts.

Used the Doorknobs.

Harold Vailhancourt, of the Yale Theater, Maywood, Illinois, writes he has been using the "doorknob special" idea for four weeks and thinks it the best publicity scheme he has found yet, adding "with the money received from the advertising on the back page, I can pay printing bills and still have a little left.

The program is printed on heavy, but cheap paper that takes a 50-screen cut very nicely for the front page. The first issue urged the fans to retain the program for at least a week, that it might be consulted. The program is nothing more than an advertisement of the films for each day, which is about all that a doorknob special need be. Probably in time it will grow into a house organ, but it seems to be doing very nicely as it is and evidently gets the business in.

This program seems to more than pay expenses. Others do not cover the expense with more advertising than the three cards this contains. Evidently there is a wide variance in the prices asked. Don't make the advertising too cheap.

Advanced.

R. D. Wilson, of the Osborne Theater, Winnipeg, Canada, writes that he has just stepped out of the projection room into the manager's office, and sends in some recent bulletins. The issue is a four pager and though Mr. Wilson is a very new manager, he makes the program work for the house as well as the reels of the moment. Some of the pages look a little "white" through a scarcity of headlines, but otherwise they show up well. One phrase we like is used in speaking of the vacuum cleaner. He declares "you are safer here than in the open air."

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

At the Inquest.

ALONG about half way through the meeting of the Inquest Club the other night, E. M. Wickes wanted to know if it really was a meeting of the Inquesters or a lecture on the Universal, because Monte Katterjohn was doing most of the talking, but Mr. Katterjohn was doing most of the talking because he had things to say, his most appreciated remark being that he would be glad to have the questers become the guests of the Universal at their projection rooms some evening, and it is probable that this invitation will be accepted for one of the May meetings.

Mr. Katterjohn and the Coroner spoke at some length of the evil that men do in the cutting room, explaining to some of the fortunate why their stories looked so very poor on the screen after an overrun of perhaps fifty per cent. of the footage had been eliminated by the slovenly process of cutting out entire scenes instead of gaining by shortening the scenes at the start and finish. Sometimes 3,000 feet may be condensed to 2,000 with profit, but it is not generally the case.

A recent item in this department in which Mr. Katterjohn spoke of "strangely foreign" scenes was elaborated. It is a simple matter to make South African or East Indian scenes around Los Angeles, so long as not too many structures (which must be specially built) are shown, and the mountain districts afford slopes much like those of Switzerland, but without the chalets. Strangely foreign, therefore, means the certain peculiarities of architecture that cannot be reproduced in America without too great an expense.

One important point was the definition of "comedy-drama." It was not, it was explained, an alternation of raw farce and tense tragedy, but a drama with a slight comedy relief that did not intrude upon the big scenes. Many writers, it was shown, were under the impression that both the comedy and the drama must be in each scene or at least in all parts of the film, but it was argued that in the rapid succession of scenes there was no time afforded in which to swing the audience from comedy to tragedy and back again.

Discussion of the reels lately witnessed at the Savoy Theater did not bring much food for discussion, but it did advance the fact that most of the old time dramas and plays presented as multiple reels were purchased to please some old time director who remembered with appreciation the dramatic situations of the relic of the past. In many cases it happens that the tense situation of the stage does not work out so well in photoplay.

The next meeting of the Inquesters will be held Monday evening, April 29th, at the Savoy Theater.

Mrs. Carr Wants.

Mrs. Carr writes that the North American wants artistic one, two and three reel subjects and adds:

> It seems very hard to get the sort of photoplays that are worth while, and I must confess that sometimes I grow disheartened.

And this in spite of the fact that the schools turn out a few thousand graduates a week and lots of others write plays without even a school course because they "just know" that they can write better stuff than they see on the screen. It seems to be up to some of the real ones to cheer Mrs. Carr up. She does not mention prices. Better write and ask her first if you are sure you can deliver the goods.

Frontier Wants.

Frontier wants "clever light comedies, suitable for one reel production." They should be sent to Santa Paula, Cal.

Perhaps.

A correspondent suggests that the possible granting of copyright privilege (it has not come yet) may result in a new pest even worse than the schools, the fake copyright lawyer.

This looks like a promising field for the faker. The patent lawyer is a necessity since certain forms of preparation must be followed and interference argued, but copyright, where possible, is simple in the extreme. You send to the Copyright Office for entry cards, which are supplied free. You fill out one yourself with the very simple entries and put in an envelope with your fee, then you take it to the post office, tell the clerk that it is copyright business, and you don't even have to put on postage stamps. We do not believe that copyright is coming, even through the able and adroit efforts of Congressman Willis, but if it does and you hire a lawyer, you will be foolish in the extreme.

No Vacancies.

When we announced that we had decided to abandon script criticism in favor of a study of the work of certain pupils, we had no idea that we would be deluged by applications for free scholarships. Clearly there are even more photoplaywriters in New York than we thought there were. For the benefit of the half dozen who have not yet written in, we would explain that we shall not need student material for at least a year.

It is characteristic of the lack of care of many writers that of all the letters, but two writers enclosed a return stamped envelope and two others stamps unaffixed. The rest, asking a favor, left the writer to supply paper, envelope and stamps as well as time. It is not stinginess on the part of the writers, they simply do not think of the little courtesies, though they are loud in demanding courtesy for themselves, and yet a favor is always more willingly granted to the courteous applicant.

Outsiders.

About three times a week someone wants to know if the outsider ever gets a chance. One of these inquiries some time ago was framed with such sincerity that we wrote a two-page letter in reply, telling the author the exact situation. He wrote he had decided that he would stick. The other day we shook hands with him. It was in the office of one of the big companies and he pointed with pride to his new desk.

Six months ago no one even knew his right name, for a previous line of work had given him a pen name. He had no pull, but he did give promise as a writer. Following our advice he concentrated on one studio; the studio his work best seemed to fit. In the end he was asked to come over and see the plant and how pictures were made and he went back home only long enough to get his other suit and some clean collars before he got on the regular staff.

You can do the same thing if you have it in you to stick and learn to make good. It is not pull that counts. It's hustle and ability.

Without Straw.

You would not try to make bricks without straw, providing that they still made bricks with straw. Why try to make a photoplay without a plot? Maybe you think you have a plot, but be certain. Fully half the stories that are sent back are sent back because they have no plots, and a story without a plot is as useless as a honk without an automobile to go with it.

It is the plot that makes incident interesting. No matter how funny each incident may be, without a plot there is no binding interest, no question to hold the interest to its solution. The plot is the question and it's answer Jim and Jack love Jane. Who wins? The question and the answer is the plot. If Jim and Jack love ane in the first scene and are still loving her in the last, no matter how attractive the various situations the proposition calls up, the story is unfinished and therefore is not a story. This is, of course, an elementary example, but the idea holds good of all plots.

Ask a question.

Answer the question.

The interest in the story lies in the cleverness with which you keep the audience guessing as to the answer. Make them want Jim and Jack to win, make them afraid that the other fellow will be the one to lead Jane to the altar and the result is a story that holds the attention because it rouses interest first in Jim or Jack and then in the question of his victory or defeat.

And even after you get a story it may not be a photoplay story. Not all stories make good plots for photoplays. We've a series of fifteen books on the desk right now. Each contains four to six stories. We are trying to find twelve photoplay stories out of the seventy or eighty. They are stories, but not stories to be told in action.

Most beginners want to write a story Tuesday and get the check for it Friday. The child learns first his letters, then learns to combine the letters into two and three-letter combinations. After a time he can spell words of eleven syllables.

Learn first what a plot is.

Then write simple plots.

Then learn to intensify these plots by adding more plot.

Then add more story, and so, more plot, and get into the two-reel class, but don't expect to dash off two-reel stories and expect to sell, any more than you would expect to learn the alphabet and because you know the difference between O and Q start in to spell protoplastic or heptastitch.

No lasting success was ever founded on a chance sale of a first script. There is certain preparatory work that MUST be done. Make up your mind to do it quickly and get it through with. It's the only way.

Plagiarism.

It has been quite some time since we have had a complaint of plagiarism, though we think that there have been kicks that were not registered with us. Comes James A. Davis with this letter:

> I am a constant reader of your department and find your articles a great help to me, not only in the writing of photoplays, but also in my other literary work. I was very much interested recently in your remarks on plagiarism. Along this line I am compelled to believe somewhat in mental telegraphy. For instance: Some time ago I wrote a script, following the style and instructions of a certain editor and I, of course, had him in mind as I planned each scene mentally. The result was this, before I submitted my script that same editor completed and had staged a script with plot almost identical. Now take the inexperienced writer of fiction or scripts and you have this result: If he had a story in the mail or in the hands of editor, whether that editor had read his story or not, and a story of similar plot or style appeared, the howl of plagiarism would be heard. The plain fact is that the other fellow beat him to IT.
> Success to you in your work.

Trying to write the editor's own style of stuff is quite likely to run afoul of his own story. We can top that. Got one back the other day that ran: "I made this two weeks ago—also about five years ago."

Every writer knows that he is bound, now and then, to use some old idea and men like Mr. Davis make allowance for the fact, though Mr. Davis could not help knowing there was no theft since he had not sent out his story.

When you are dead sure that someone has stolen your story, think of Mr. Davis's experience and cool off.

Rejection Slips.

Recently we invited comment as to the use of rejection slips and just one writer, Miss Alice C. Brown, seems to have any ideas on the matter. She says:

> In regard to rejection slips, why don't all the editors send "overstocked" slips to the "Impossible"? "Overstocked until" three or four months ahead would—or ought to—curb the impulses of the crowd, without hurting their feelings, and three or four months' practice might develop an impossible into a prospect. If not, and if they come back, another overstocked would shunt them for another period, and possibly kill the majority. Personally, I don't take any stock in the conventional words on the slips. My experience hasn't been very extensive, but even so, I've had a couple of "come-backs" that rob the slips of their terrors. Once upon a time, I sent a tragic, perfectly original story to a certain magazine, and it brought back the statement that the editor "regretted that it was not available for "Under the Chestnut Tree." It certainly was not, but the office boy need not have added insult to injury. Another time, a scenario was returned with a note at the foot of a letter, that "Arizona Sweethearts" was not available, etc.; it happened that my script was "The Light in the Wilderness" and the other fellow's was "Arizona Sweethearts." Again the office boy was at fault. This was the more inexcusable in that the note was written on the other fellow's own letter, and returned (?) with my script. I also have gotten them back without any slip at all, but I sensed the gist of the proposition—the editor didn't want the script, and that was all that mattered.

That is all that does matter at the moment, but the idiot of to-day may be the star of to-morrow and no editor likes to take a chance. On the other hand, something might be done to kill off the palpable pests and the overstocked seems to be a good solution. It is passed on to the editors.

We can recall a time when our own short stories were so bad that an editor would have been justified in chloroforming us, but we got better and sold to the self-same companies to their complete contentment.

On the other hand, we think that real harm is done by the checked rejection slip, and few companies still use this form of slip. We like best Lawrence S. McCloskey's slip, which leaves plenty of room for a helpful hint when he wants to write one. That is the sort of help that counts.

In our own editorial days we used to have one contributor who hit an idea about every three months. We read an awful lot of horrible stuff in between, but we never took the axe to him because now and then he did hit a good idea. It is the same thing that now calls out the "jolly" slips. The best thing would seem to be to warn the authors not to take them too seriously.

Learn Things.

Here is part of an interesting letter:

> Perhaps I will win out in the end; I have sold two single-reel scripts. And I owe it (that is, my possible success), in a way, to you. I have always been a failure. I have been a carpenter, a glass-worker and a terra-cotta worker. I have studied oil painting. If I visited a doctor I would find him showing me his instruments, and he would end up by telling me that I should have been a doctor. And it would be the same with musicians, and lawyers, with men of almost any trade or profession. Hunters and fishermen would talk to me, taking it for granted that I was one of themselves, though I had never caught a trout or shouldered a shotgun. But I, myself, knew that I would succeed at none of these things. I could write passable English but thought I could not write stories because I lacked imagination.
> That is where I was wrong. I wrote my first scripts because paper was cheap and I needed money. I finally sold one for twenty-five dollars. Then I started buying the MOVING PICTURE WORLD. The articles you wrote on "plots" were revelations to me. Imagination is my one strong point; and story writing is the one thing in which I may, possibly, make a success. And if I do succeed I will owe it to you. I read the Editor, I have The Plot of the Short Story and have read numerous other works of a like nature; but those little talks of yours in the MOVING PICTURE WORLD were what put me on the right track, and I feel more grateful to you than I can express. And, by the way, most of what I read on plotting, I find I already knew, or have read it in your department.

Here's a man after our own heart. He learns things. There is not a man, woman or child in the world who cannot tell you something of interest that some day may be of value to you, and a writer, of all persons, needs to know all things. Doctors show this correspondent their instruments and his medical scenes are correct as are his hunting and fishing scenes and others. He is building up a foundation for a perfect treasury of facts. And each of these facts may, some day, suggest a story and a good one. Read and listen and you'll learn. Lubin's "Women of the Desert" and "In the Harem of Hashem ' were based on the Koran or rather suggested by parts of that work and the footnotes to the "Sale" translation and "Winning His Wife" was built on the centuries old Ramayana, though the story is modern. Get your hints from everywhere and remember that the more you can know the more you can write.

And the same trait that leads this writer to pick up information from everywhere leads him now to study plotting for he knows that therein lies his present weakness. Most authors seem to rise superior to plotting, though we have had one pupil working on plots along since last fall and he's just commencing to realize what a plot it. You do not have to draw plans in order to build a dog house, but you can build a better dog house if you draw plans, and you can't possibly put up a three-story building without them. The plot is to the story what the plan is to the builder, if you would build a story draw a plan or a plot.

With Seeing Eyes.

If you take the time to read this department, why not take the trouble to know what you are reading? Just the other day a visitor told us she read every line and it helped her so much, so very much. Then we spoke of a paragraph in the preceding issue and had to get out the scrap book to show what we were talking about. She remembered that she had read it.

It was a scheme that was precisely what she needed, but she had read merely the words and not the thought behind the words, and so she gained no benefit from her reading.

At the head of the Inquiry Department each week it is stated that a list of addresses will be sent free under certain conditions. One of those conditions is that the paper and not this department be addressed, and yet two or three letters a day addressed to this department ask for the list and we have to stop other work and get out the list and put it in the envelope and seal it and drop it in the box. They read that a list will be sent and stop reading and dash off to send a request incorrectly. This is not, perhaps, a matter of great importance, but it shows how few read understandingly, and yet hundreds read Technique of the Photoplay through once and get little in return. Others study it and get full value. As one recent writer said, "You can't carry it around in your clothes and expect to catch it like you do the measles. You must study and absorb it."

It's the same way with the department. Don't give it the "once over." Study to get the fullest meaning from each line.

Self Deception.

There seems to be a growing class of writers who deliberately delude themselves. They get a story. In their hearts they know the story is all wrong, because the characters act as no human beings ever would act. Just the other day we told a writer that no woman would possibly act as one of her characters was acting. "I think that this woman would," was her ingenuous reply, and she is still wondering why we won't criticise her scripts when we could write a play in the time it would take to point out all this sort of stuff in her work.

If it will make a strongly dramatic scene to have Mary stab her father, don't put it in just "to make the story more interesting." It does not make the story either interesting or dramatic, but merely irritating unless there is a clean-cut and logical reason why Mary should commit fratricide.

"He's such a consistent writer," explained an editor the other day, telling how a certain writer came to get a fat studio job. "He never has a character do a startling thing that he does not first prepare you for it. He doesn't make you expect to see the hero jump over a railroad train, but if he did have this action, there would be some scene earlier in the story to show that John was enough of a jumper to accomplish the feat, so that the act, when it is performed, is a surprise but not a shock."

"Preparation for the event," is one of the first things that writers should learn, and about the last thing they do learn.

Writing to Suit.

"I don't see why I should write to suit the editors," is the burden of a recent letter. "It is the public that should be suited."

Jusso. And any time the public hands you a check for your stories you write to please the public.

As it stands, it is the business of the theater manager to try and please his patrons. It is the business of the rental exchange to try and please the manager. It is the endeavor of the manufacturer to try and give the exchange what it wants, and it is the business of the editor to give his employer, the manufacturer, the sort of stories the manufacturer thinks the exchange thinks the manager thinks the public wants. It is merely your business to give the editor what he thinks the manufacturer thinks the exchange thinks the manager thinks the public wants. You suit the editor and your responsibility stops there. You may know better—much better—than the editor what the public really wants, but it is the editor who sends you the release slip and he will not send one for what does not please him.

And it is just barely possible that he knows more about it than you do, after all.

Poor Economy.

Don't worry along with a broken down typewriter when perhaps for a dollar or two a repair man could put it in proper shape. You'll do better work if the machine does better work.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

C. S.—Most of your letter is taken up in the department. By suggesting one ending for home consumption and a stronger one for the foreign trade, Mrs. Breuil had in mind the censorship rules.

W. M. O.—This department does not recommend any photoplay course by mail. The school you mention is the one reliable concern we know of.

M. J. B.—Photoplays are written in a certain fashion. If you will send a commercial No. 10 envelope, stamped and addressed to yourself, to this department, you will be supplied with more definite information. Repeat the question, please.

H. H.—We do not recommend submitting to that company.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT IS an established rule of the Moving Picture World, and of this department, that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until such articles have been demonstrated to a member of our staff. In case of apparatus pertaining to projection, this means the editor of this department.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication, it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two to three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending 4 cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you can't answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 30.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use the contributor's name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Explain, and show by sketch, how you would measure the horsepower of an engine or a motor.

Roll of Honor on Question No. 24.

Question 24 brought out a number of excellent answers—some of them very good indeed. Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada; L. B. Minges, Lestershire, New York; Los Angeles, California; W. S. James, Camden, New Jersey; St. Louis, Missouri; S. S. Holt, Marshalltown, Iowa; Chicago, Illinois; Boston, Massachusetts (2); C. F. Smith, Beach, North Dakota; San Francisco, California, and Harry T. Dobson, Toronto, Canada.

I have selected the reply by St. Louis, Missouri, as the best in that it covers the greatest number of points with the least error.

The replies of brothers James, Minges, Usher, Holt, and, in fact, all those on the Roll of Honor this week are very excellent indeed. The sketches submitted by brother Usher are very fine.

Reply to Question No. 24.

By "St. Louis," Missouri.

The question:

Suppose you were using 110 volt a. c. from a city lighting system, and the owner purchased a 70 volt d. c. generator to supply current for the entire house. What, if any, changes would be necessary in the theater equipment, giving, in detail, reasons for each change named. The city current being 110 volt a. c., what shape would this leave you in case of breakdown in your plant, and what could or would you do, or recommend, under these circumstances?

The answer:

There are a great many angles from which question 24 may be considered. Also there are quite a number of ways in which the question could be correctly answered. If the city voltage be 110 a. c. and the house generator voltage be 70 d. c., it would require the changing of almost everything but the wiring in order to switch over from the 110 volt to the 70 volt. In the first place, reducing the voltage to 70 and changing from a. c. to d. c. would require first the changing of all the incandescent lamps, and all motors, including ventilation, fans and projection machine motors. It would also require the changing of ozone machines, if any were used; and of the flaming arc lamps, if any there be. It would require the exchanging of any transformers or choke coils for resistance. This is to be qualified, however, by the statement that it is possible to get motors that will run on either a. c. or d. c., but such motors are seldom economical on more than one of the currents, and, moreover, the 110 volt motors could not be operated on 70. About the only thing pertaining to the 110 volt system which would remain as it was would be the house wiring, switches, fuses and projection arc lamps. It would even be necessary to change the volt and ammeters, if any there be.

Having effected the change and installed 70 volt incandescent globes, 70 volt d. c. motors, flaming arc lamps, and a small rotary converter to supply the ozone machines and resistance in place of transformers or choke coils for the projection circuits you could then arrange to cut over to the 110 volt a. c. system temporarily by cutting in sufficient resistance in the house feeders to reduce the voltage to 70, and by cutting out the d. c. motors which would, of course, leave you without ventilation, and oblige you to run the projection machines by hand. But this would be pretty costly since the difference between 110 volts and 70 volts would be consumed in the resistance and you would have to pay for that waste. Moreover, you would get a higher amperage at the arc than you would with d. c., using the same resistance. Of course, if a type of motor be used which would run with either a. c. or d. c., then it would not be necessary to cut out the motors.

The foregoing is practical, but what I would recommend to my manager would be either the use of 70 volts on the projection arc and the use of 110 volts for the fans and house lighting, or else, the installation of a 110 to 70 volt a. c. to d. c. rotary converter to be used in case of breakdown. This would allow you to switch from one supply to the other without any change whatever, and while such a converter would be costly where only designed for temporary use in case of breakdown, still it would, in my judgment, be a good investment. The method of wiring in the latter case is shown on page 102 and 103 of the Handbook.

Question 24 is really one which is intensely practical, and it is one which should be thoroughly understood by operators. It looks simple when you first glance at it, but the more you look at the thing the more you are likely to conclude that it is not a simple question at all, but a mighty hard one.

This reply, I think, covers the ground pretty thoroughly, except that St. Louis' second recommendation amounts to a possible duplication of the outfit already installed, since the source of power is not indicated in the question. As remarked, question 24 is by no means an easy one. I was amused by one of the brothers who said: "Question 24 is the easiest one I have tried to answer (its not easy, but just the easiest of the twenty-four)." I am afraid the brother is entitled to another view of that matter, because it is not the easiest of the twenty four, by a considerable jump, to my way of thinking. In fact, there are more points involved in question 24 than in any other one which has preceded it, and I am glad to see that so many were able to give a reasonably comprehensive and fairly correct reply.

Nicholas Power.

The writer is in receipt of post cards from various points in Europe and Africa sent by Nicholas Power, the last being from Luxor, Egypt. Mr. Power has, it pains me greatly to be obliged to say, become a regular gad-about. The card before the last one came from Constantinople, the city of harems. Probably the next one will be dated the Fiji Islands, Patagonia, South America, or some equally outlandish place. Shame upon you, brother Power! We are surprised at a man of your years and superior discretion gallivanting around the world like a ten year old kid.

Joking aside, however, Nicholas Power has earned a rest if anybody ever did, and we are mighty glad he is able to get away from business, travel around and enjoy life. We would do the same thing ourselves if we could, but since we cannot we are more or less jealous and there you are.

Addresses Wanted.

L. Fuller, New York City, writes:

> Several years ago I made every effort to obtain certain information and finally after many failures applied to you and obtained the same at once, which was correct, therefore merely as a reward, I am annoying you again. I have for some time been trying to obtain the factory or studio address of say, ten of the best motion picture producers. On several occasions the reply has given me the city office or film exchange address, but what I want is to reach the factory where the camera work is done, and as a last resort am addressing you.

I see that you are located at Union Square in the Hotel Slevin right in the middle of New York. Now, my dear boy, if you will place one foot in front of the other, alternately, and keep doing it until you are carried straight across Union Square to number 24, you will there find Mr. Epes Winthrop Sargent, Esq., and if, as an open sesame, you show him this article, he will give you the address of every film producer, both past and present, and if he wishes to can also provide you with their history almost to the remote item. Friend Epes is a reasonably good natured thumpagun, so you need not approach in fear and trembling.

P. S.—You don't need to provide me with any reward for this.

Righto.

Jacksonville, Florida, says:

> Have not turned a crank for more than year, simply because I will not work for present wages, nor will I join a union. I am, however, keeping up to date, and you will find enclosed money order for the book by Swoope. When I hear some of the operators talk it makes me feel very incompetent until I see the results they put on the screen, whereupon my confidence returns.

Correct, neighbor Hawkins. Some of the boys who talk loud are a good deal like a base drum—all noise and mighty little but wind inside of them. You are wrong and very foolish in saying you will not join the organization of your craft. By becoming a member of the union you are simply emulating the example of the banker, the lawyer and the doctor, all of whom belong to the unions of their professions.

A Pleasant Visit.

The committee who examined the dissenting faction of New York operators for admission into Local 306, by invitation of the editor, spent one evening at his home. By reason of sickness of two of the original appointees William C. Franke, Business Agent of Boston Local Union 182 and W. A. Clark, Secretary-Treasurer, of Springfield, Mass., Local 186, and William Canavan, 3rd Vice-President, I. A. T. S. E., composed the committee. A most pleasant evening was spent, although brother Franke and the editor had some strenuous discussion.

The preceding photograph shows brother Franke enjoying life in New York City. It is self evident that the visit to Gotham was a thoroughly enjoyable occasion for the Business Agent of Local 182. The reason for the calmly dignified look of repose upon his statuesque and mildly classical countenance is variously explained by different ones. Brother Canavan asserts that when this picture was taken Franke was preparing a broadside for one of the candidates, whereas Clark avers that Franke had just closed his eyes to get them straightened out, they having become cross-eyed from trying to take in the charms of six Broadway damsels in one glance. Personally the editor rejects both these explanations, and is inclined to think that the glare of the Great White Way is responsible, or that Franke has his eyes closed to help concentrate his thoughts so that he could think of a new argument to advance while discussing matters with the editor. At any rate we are reliably informed that the local that brother Franke represents is not near as sleepy as its business manager appears to be.

The next picture is entirely self-explanitory. The last picture shows Clarke, Franke and Canavan watching the Broadway poultry display. Note carefully the interested look on Clark's face.

One Sided.

This department is in receipt of a copy of the contract which the Griffin Amusement Company, whose headquarters is somewhere in Ontario, Canada, requires its employees to sign. Section 3 of the clause says: "The company reserves the absolute right to dispense with the services of said employee at any time, without being called upon to assign any cause therefor, or without giving said employee any prior notice thereof; whereupon said employee shall receive his said salary or wages calculated at the rate of ——— dollars per week, up to and inclusive of the day his said services may be so dispensed with by said company, and for no longer period." Clause 5 says: "That the said employee shall during the whole term of his employment give his undivided and entire attention to the business of said company."

My gracious goodness, what a howl the Griffin Amusement Company would probably make if one of its operators quit without any notice whatever! The aforesaid G. A. Company would feel that it had been outraged—that it had been badly dealt with by the employee, and that it was very much aggrieved: in all of which it would be entirely correct. But let me inform the Griffin Amusement Company that it is a mighty poor rule that does not work both ways. The employee has just exactly as much right to feel outraged and aggrieved at being summarily discharged without notice as the employer has to feel that way when an employee quits summarily and without notice. In the first case the employer may be put to considerable inconvenience, and some loss, and in the latter case the employee would undoubtedly be put to considerable loss and inconvenience—and there you are. We are also informed that the aforesaid Griffin Amusement Company is paying some of its operators as high as $15 per week, and that it feels this is too much. Well it certainly is an awful sum of money to pay all in one chunk for a week's work, particularly when that work is performed by the man upon whom the excellence of the entire show depends. Really the company has reason to feel that it is a regular spendthrift in dishing out such an enormous sum every Saturday night. If it was not so serious a matter it would be laughable.

Keeping Up the Good Work.

B. Steinhauser, Shelbyville, Indiana, writes:

> Don't see much in the department from this city except from our amateur cameraman, friend Stiles. Nevertheless we are on the map and enthusiastic readers of the Moving Picture World. We have our troubles the same as the rest, but hold to the theory that troubles located by the operator himself are more valuable to him than where he seeks and obtains help. Now don't get the idea I am knocking the department. By no means. Keep up the good work. What did that Minneapolis matter (Mr. Hirsch) mean? When such things appear it is time to speak up. Is it a joke, or were the questions bona fide? Then regarding another matter in the same issue, February 28th, by Robert T. St. James: I have been working along those lines for some time, and have made a few experiments. The contrast proposition sounds correct, up to a certain point, but with my arrangement the trailer flicker blades of the shutter can be completely done away with, thus increasing the amount of light very largely. However, I don't believe friend St. James is correct when he says the auxiliary light would have to be selective by reason of the constantly changing density of the film. This with my arrangement is done automatically, the auxiliary light being reflected from the machine side of the shutter.

What I suppose brother Steinhauser means is that he has affixed a reflecting device to the blade of the shutter which, of course, would make the light automatically selective. But I nevertheless believe that any light thrown to the screen during the dark period will do more harm than good. As to that Minneapolis matter, why possibly the gentleman had an idea he was a comedian. We are all likely to be mistaken sometimes.

Keeping Up with the Game.

L. Scott Woods, Fitchburg, Massachusetts, writes for the address of the publishers of "Lessons in Practical Electricity" and "The Electric Motor." He says:

> I have a fairly good knowledge of electricity—sufficient to pass the Massachusetts operators' examination. I know just enough to realize what a lot I don't know. To my mind the next general advance will be the installation of motor-generator sets, and motor driven machines, and, since I desire to keep up with the parade, I want these two books.

Brother Woods is absolutely right in his position. "Keep up with the parade" is something we all have to do unless we want to drop behind and become back numbers; and a back number is not much good to himself or anybody else. It is the live ones, the up-to-date ones, the well posted ones who count in the moving picture game or in anything else in this old world of ours.

Answers to Questions.

Archie Duncan, Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada, orders a Handbook and copy of the questions. Says he would be glad to have the answers also.

The answers to the questions will be published from week to week in the department, and that is the only way they can be procured.

Photographer-Operator.

Andrew M. Body, Manhattan, Kansas, makes his departmental bow as follows:

> Enclosed find photographs which I took. I send them for your inspection and criticism. Have been turning the crank for four years, first in Pennsylvania, but have been here about fourteen months. I note in February 28th issue that brother Rogers says he can see the crater of his carbons on the face of his condenser by looking through the tinted glass in the lamp house. This is true, but I have placed a red or smoked glass in a metal frame on the outside of the lamp house at an angle with the ruby glass so that I can see the crater without any trouble. Am using a Simplex and Edison Model B, pulling 35 amperes from a Wagner converter. In one of the photographs you will notice that two wings of the three-wing shutter are perforated. I find this gives a great deal more light, and by making the shutter blade a little larger than the standard it will almost eliminate flicker. I have also made an arrangement to hold a ruby glass so that the white light from the spot does not strike the eyes. I find by this combination and the painting of the interior of the room dead black relieves the strain on the eyes and enables the operator to keep his picture in better focus than he otherwise could. I have spliced two spiral springs, like those used on screen doors, for a take-up belt, and it works fine. I use cotton flannel held between the fingers to clean the films, and find that it not only helps to clear the picture, but if any part of the film is likely to break it will do so in the process of cleaning, which eliminates stops during the show. I would like to know if you object to a non-union operator corresponding, remembering that we operators in small towns have trouble in joining the union.

Where in the world did you get the idea, brother Body, that this department was for union operators alone? It is quite true that I favor organization, but the department is for everybody who has anything of interest to offer, utterly regardless of whether he belongs to the organization or not. As to the ruby glass and dead black walls you have my ideas exactly, except that instead of ruby I would use very light green—what is known as a pot green glass. Dead black walls are the only walls for an operating room. The less light in the operating room the better will an operator be able to see his picture and correct faults therein. Don't overlook that fact. As to the lamp house reflector, that has been published several times. What brother Rogers meant was the side-line of the carbon; your reflector shows the side view, not the side-line. Come again, brother, when the spirit moves you. By the way, your photographs certainly are splendid.

The photograph of the theater cannot be beat, I think. I have placed your picture on the same card with the theater in order to save space.

From the Green Mountains.

New Hampshire sends the following:

> Find enclosed $2.25 for Swoope's book and those questions, which all real operators are getting. By the term "real," I mean those who realize that, no matter how much they may know, they still have more to learn, and are willing to get right down and study. I have been operating for three and a half years and am a member of local 195. I have always been a department fan and it is, thanks to it, that I am something that looks like an operator today. Am the proud possessor of a Handbook and must say that it deserves its place among the "books of art" where a certain person recently saw it in a New York Library. I am grinding away in a 6 x 8 operating room; I hate to call a thing like that a room, but do so out of courtesy to yourself. Am running a Power's Six A, using 110 volt, 60 cycle current through a Fort Wayne compensarc, the latter on 60 ampere contact. For some reason, which I am unable to determine, my fuses, or, more particularly, one of them, which, by the way, are 60 ampere and placed on the primary side of my compensarc, gets so hot that I cannot keep my fingers on it more than five seconds. Now, I know it to be a fact that one side of my supply line is grounded to the operating room, and I am also sure that it is ahead of the main switch in the operating room, as I have been over every inch of the machine and lamp circuit, which are O. K. All the other wiring is in conduit.

If 60 ampere fuses on the primary side of your compensarc get hot there is something radically wrong somewhere, and it would indicate a very large waste which is being registered on your meter. I would suggest that you have the power company man put an ammeter on the primary and see what reading you get. If those fuses are 60 ampere you must have an awful current leakage somewhere. You ought to be pulling only about 20 amperes on the primary. The indication is, however, that you are pulling more than 60, which would be equivalent to using 180 amperes at the arc—somewhat expensive. No, I don't like to call a coop of that size a room, but the point I have made is, as long as we talk about coops we keep the coop idea in the managers' noodle. If we get him accustomed to talking about rooms he will soon get used to thinking about a room and maybe build one. Many thanks, New Hampshire, for your kind words. Better put an ammeter on those primaries and see what is doing. It hardly seems possible there can be such a condition as your letter indicates.

A Queer Thing.

E. A. Nelson, proprietor Star Theater, Duluth, Minnesota, writes:

> I am owner of a one-floor picture house containing 400 seats. Enclosed find photograph and drawing of the auditorium. (Don't find any photograph.—Ed.) The house is satisfactory, except for the acoustics. When the auditorium is one-third full the acoustic effect is fine, but as soon as it fills up the music seems to have a dead sound, and I can hardly hear the violin of the three-piece orchestra when standing at the entrance. You will note there is no sounding board in the ceiling above the orchestra pit, and the fact > that there are beams projecting below the ceiling may have some effect on the matter. What I would like to be informed of, through the columns of the department, is the best way to remedy this trouble at small cost. I have been told that it could be helped by stretching steel wires near the ceiling, but I have been offered so many suggestions as to the way to place these wires that I am at sea as regards which is best. Therefore seek your advice, or trust you will allow discussion through the department, though I know it is not exactly in line with your work, yet it may be of great interest to other managers who have similar troubles.

No, brother Nelson, I don't feel competent to advise you in this matter, nor do I believe that the stretching of steel wires will accomplish the purpose, though it is possible it might. I would myself prefer to have this matter discussed in the department. Personally I am inclined to think that the ceiling beams are the real seat of the trouble though other houses which have a similar ceiling arrangement experience no such difficulty. I think I will have to pass the matter up to the department fans, and ask them to express their views, also any of them who feel disposed can communicate directly with friend Nelson. The underlying principle of acoustics is the funnel or megaphone. Roughly speaking, an architect plans an auditorium as much like a megaphone as he can. This accounts for all parts of an auditorium tapering toward the stage. The sounding board above is part of this scheme and seems to be of more value than any other part of the scheme. Try placing some solid surface at a bevel below the ceiling, running clear across. A drop of two feet on the side away from the audience should make a big difference. Get it flush against the ceiling on the near edge. A drop of two feet would mean a surface three feet wide if set at 45%.

More Theaters.

Seattle, Washington, orders a question booklet and says:

> There are three theaters to open their doors to the public here in the latter part of May, or the first part of June. They are the Alaskan on Second Avenue, the Mission on Fourth Avenue and the Liberty on First Avenue. The Alaskan will have a seating capacity of about 900, the Mission about the same and the Liberty something like 2500, the latter will be the largest picture house in the city. There is considerable talk about two more houses going in, but it is not definite.

Suffering mother of the sacred garter snake! Seattle can take its place at the head of the class at once. I certainly thought when I was there last summer, that that little city was pretty reasonably well supplied with moving picture theaters, and it certainly had some beauties too. And now here are three more, one with a seating capacity of 2500, and the end, it seems, is not yet. Well, more power to you, Seattle. It is merely a proof that your city knows a good thing when it sees it. My compliments to the boys; both friend and foe (we will all be friends some day). May their shadows never grow less, and their projection continually grow better.

It is Great.

Ernest Morris, Cleveland, Mississippi, writes:

> Received the Handbook and can say it is simply great. Am running a Power's Six, using 40 amperes of 60 cycle current through a Fort Wayne Compensarc, 43 M. P objective, mirroroide screen, 13.6 picture at 68 feet, Power's regular two-wing shutter. Have a bad flicker. Have tried various kinds of pasteboard shutters without result, also three-wing shutters of different width blades. Also have a jump in the picture. Intermittent sprocket has a little circumferential play. Am running 120 day stuff, so you can see where I am at.

As to the flicker, it seems that you have tried about everything, therefore I am afraid I cannot help you in the shutter matter. Probably you are running below normal speed and in that event there is nothing that will stop the flicker except increasing the speed of the projector. As to the other matter: you will have to tell me what kind of a jump it is. Read the instructions on the Power's Six machine in the Handbook carefully. Possibly it is in the film, as you are using 120 day stuff.

Strand Operating Room.

For months those in touch with affairs in Gotham filmdom have been impatient for the opening of the Strand Theater. It was heralded abroad that the Strand was not only to be the most magnificent home of the photo-play in all America, but also the very last word in up-to-dateness.

The Precision Machine Company displayed to the writer with very evident and fully justifiable pride two Simplex machines having lamps of 100 ampere capacity, and white enameled stands and magazines. We were given to understand that the installation was to be ideal in every way and we fully expected that it would be.

Friday afternoon, the day before the Strand opened, the writer, acting on his own initiative, climbed up to the operating room. Here is exactly what he found. A "coop," reached by an iron ladder fastened to the wall, located approximately 150 feet from the screen and, at a guess 40 feet above it. This room is so small that there is hardly more than 30 inches between the arc lamp controls of the projection machines and the back wall of the room if there is that much. And this notwithstanding the fact that they could just as well have built a room 10 x 20; there is plenty of space and to spare. The ceiling of this room was originally made so low that it was necessary to tear it out and raise it up all it could be raised without cutting through the roof, which makes a sloping ceiling, the highest point of which is not more than seven or eight feet from the floor. Originally there was no vent flue at all—only a window at the rear, but they did cut a vent flue through the roof when they raised the ceiling. Now they could just as well have made that flue 24 inches in diameter, but instead of that they made a little inadequate vent, which I am sure will not exceed 16 inches in diameter, and I doubt if it is even that large; but I will deal with this phase of the matter further on.

The observation holes were originally round in shape and about 10 inches in diameter, but they were cut through the brick wall so high up that it was necessary to chop out the bottom about 8 inches, and even then the hole is so high that if the operator sits down at all he will have to have a chair about four feet high. The floor is of concrete, but the machines are blocked up on wooden blocks. It may be claimed that this is only a temporary arrangement, I do not know, but that is absolutely no excuse. The exact height and pitch of the machines should have been figured out, and a concrete slope made to receive their stands. At one end of the room, on a shelf probably three feet from the floor, are three or four huge rheostats ,made to deliver very high amperage. This room is jammed right up against the roof, and around about July I will certainly feel sorry for the operator, unless he is a salamander. As I understand the matter, they intend to pull 60 amperes d. c. At the rear is a window; in the ceiling is that little ventilator; below is an audience of 3000 people. Why, let me ask, didn't they set those rheostats up on a shelf about three feet from the ceiling, (there is nothing but the roof over the operating room) make a hood to cover the shelf, and all the enormous amount of heat those rheostats are going to produce would go right up where it would not do any harm.

And now let us consider the fire danger. The ports are protected by an elaborate system of steel shutters, held open by a master cord having fuse links. But these "fuse links" are located immediately above the upper magazine and, at a guess, at least 2 feet from the machine aperture, and again, at a guess, four feet from the lower magazine. Moreover, I did not see any damper in the vent pipe weighted to remain normally open and only held closed by being attached to the safety cord. What is going to happen if they should have a fire in the Strand operating room? With no damper in the vent pipe, and if the window at the rear happened to be closed, there is then no outlet for the smoke, except out into the auditorium. How long would it be before those fuse links melted? Well, it is a cinch they would not melt until long after the audience had caught sight of the fire and the smoke pouring out of the ports.

My disappointment was very deep. I had hoped and expected that this installation would be ideal. It is anything else but that. Nothing but praise can be given so far as the projection machines themselves be concerned, but what is the use of having fine projection machinery and hampering the operator by such an installation. If the operators in the Strand produce high class results it will be in spite of the installation, not because of it.

It is no pleasant thing to be obliged to write thus of such an otherwise magnificent house, but surely we are entitled to look for better things in the shape of an operating room in a house costing nearly $300,000.

Jack-Knife Carbon Sets.

Kansas City, Mo., contributes the following:

> Am operating two Power's Six, one old and one new. Use ¾ carbons "jack-knifed" as much as possible, pulling about 60 amperes, 110 volt a.c. The reason I use ¾ carbons in this way is that they burn slower than the ⅝, and as I have two machines I find it much more convenient, since it allows time to thread up the off machine, trim the arc, rewind, etc., without so much running back and forth to trim the arc. Also I find with the smaller carbons it is almost impossible to keep the brown edges off the picture and get machine number two ready. I send this in in the hope that it may seem practical to you and be of assistance to some one, and if I am off on any point, I hope you will correct me. I do not recommend this method of setting or the ¾ carbons where only one machine is used, because the results are not so satisfactory as the other way.

Aha! villain! Have at thee! You must be looking for trouble, Kansas City. In fact, you must have expected a roast when you wrote that. Boiled down to its real meaning you simply say: I am using a poor arrangement in order to save the salary of a helper to thread the second machine, do the rewinding, etc. The jack-knife set is out of date; it is inefficient, and has long since been discarded by up-to-date operators. No, Kansas City, I cannot recommend your scheme at all. The operator has no business running around threading machines, rewinding, etc., when his picture is on the screen; there should be a helper for that. The operator should be right there at the observation port, with one hand on the speed control, one hand in reach of his lamp controls, and both eyes glued to the screen.

Kansas City then described a trouble he was having, but I cannot make much out of it. It was so puzzling that I took the matter up with the machine manufacturers asking them to correspond with Kansas City direct, which they have done. The way Kansas City set forth his trouble it was practically impossible, so he must have made some mistake in his description. However, I would suggest that he examine his apron rollers and see if they are in line with the lower sprocket.

Can't Be Remedied.

C. E. Freeland, Newport, Oregon, writes:

> Here is a peculiar trouble I have been unable to eliminate. Possibly it may be in the film. My picture is steady, and what many would call flickerless, yet as objects with strong highlights such as faces, hands, straw hats, etc., move across the film rapidly, they seem to dance or have a jerky movement. Is there anything one can do to lessen this trouble, or is it one of the can't be overcome ones? I have a Power's Six, using 47 amperes at the arc, through a Preddey economizer, working on the fourth notch; three-wing shutter; all three wings slightly perforated. I find that the perforation of the shutter blade reduces flicker. I run 55 feet a minute, and have a strap and weight on the shutter to stop any back lash.

The trouble is in the photography, or rather it is this way: Moving pictures are not moving pictures at all, but simply still photographs taken at the rate of approximately sixteen to the second. The illusion of movement is obtained through that quality of the eye known as persistence of vision. Now when a figure moves straight across the scene rapidly, the pictures being taken at the rate of one every 1/16 of a second, the figure moves so far in the sixteenth of a second that the movement becomes visible, and the persistence of vision will not carry from one picture to the next. Your eye, under these conditions, actually catches and registers the successive still photographs. Actors should never move rapidly straight across the scene.

Orders a Handbook.

H. S. Medland, Hartley, Iowa, orders a Handbook, and says:

> I have a photoplay house seating 225. Hartley has a population of 1,100—not so large, but enjoys good projection and good subjects. I am using a Power's Six A machine, and projecting a good picture at 65 feet. Purchased the machine November of last year and had a perfectly steady picture until a week ago when I noticed a slight jump, about four times to each revolution of the crank. Upon close examination I find the intermittent sprocket idler only turns about half the time, also I am convinced the intermittent sprocket idler bracket is not true, but I do not think this would cause the jump. The intermittent sprocket is exceptionally tight, with but very slight circumferential play, but it is not tight enough to bind. The machine is thoroughly braced, so there is no movement whatever on the screen when I project a white light without a picture in.

Using a condensing lens as a magnifying glass carefully examine the face of your intermittent sprocket and see if there is not a small quantity of some substance adhering to its face somewhere, or if something has not struck its surface and raised a little bump. Your trouble is either due to that or to the sprocket shaft being sprung, and the latter is hardly possible, since it would require a heavy blow to do that. No, the idler has nothing to do with it, I think. There is something wrong with your intermittent sprocket or its shaft.

Film Signal.

Arthur Koch, Decatur, Ill., writes:

> Enclosed find patent drawings of my film signal device which I submit for your approval. I have had four of these working on machines for almost two years and they have worked with universal success. Once they are used the operator could hardly get along without them, since they tell him when his film is almost exhausted —that is to say, the signal is given in time for him to light his other lamp and get ready to change reels. The device is simple, but does wonderful work. It can be adjusted for any time, so if you have a split reel and want to run only half of it, arrangement can be made accordingly and the light will light at the proper time.

The device is as brother Koch says, quite simple. It consists of an arm at the end of which is a roller which rests on the film in the top magazine. This arm actuates a second arm which is directly connected to a switch. As the film roll decreases the arm is lowered, the switch blade is brought down until it finally makes contact and lights the lamp situated wherever desired, though presumably on top of the upper magazine. The patent drawings are too large to reproduce, and if reduced the figures would not show. However, as nearly as I can make out, the thing can be set so that the lamp will light at any desired distance from the end of the reel. Friend Koch wants capital to manufacture and market the device. My opinion is that it is entirely practical and very simple; also it would certainly be very convenient to the operator.

Mercury and Wattage.

Winnipeg, Canada, writes criticising brother Wooden's take-up as being so complicated as to be, in his judgment, not very practical. He then speaks very highly of a take-up that has been invented in Winnipeg, and says I will have one soon for testing, and that the Winnipeg boys are willing to bet that it is a device that will not be beaten for years to come. He then asks how many watts a mercury arc rectifier would take from the line in order to deliver 40 amperes at the arc. Voltage either 110 or 220. He closes by saying that a magnetized screw driver is very handy for small screws and that it can be made by laying it for awhile on the top of the transformer of the mercury arc rectifier.

I have the take-up referred to by the brother, but have not tested it yet. It certainly is simple enough. I will say more about it after the test has been made. As to the rectifier there ought to be less than 5 per cent. loss; in other words, your arc voltage multiplied by the arc amperage, plus from 3 to 5%, should give you the approximate wattage taken from the line.

The Telephone Stunt.

H. D. Grove, Davenport, Iowa, writes:

> Notice in March 28th issue the trouble Toronto, Canada, is having with his generator. Also he states he tried brother Johnston's experiment with the telephone receiver. Think he must have discovered the shunt field, and on connecting up again reversed the wires, therefore causing the series and shunt field coils to work in opposition to each other. I may, of course, be in error in this matter, but I believe that if the machine is connected in this manner the action will be as follows: With the carbons drawn far apart the current in the series would be weakened, therefore the action of the shunt would overcome it, and with the carbons close together the current in the series would increase thereby overcoming the action of the shunt and reducing the voltage. Now, when the voltage is reduced the amperage in the series is reduced, and thus the shunt is able to overcome its action and build up the voltage again. This action would set up a rapidly decreasing and increasing voltage which would cause the light to flicker, as in Toronto's case. If I am wrong in this matter don't land on me too hard.

I am not going to land on you at all. I have not time to study that matter out, therefore will just turn it over to the department fans, and if you are wrong you'll get yours.

A Cast-Iron Nerve.

Ashland, Wisconsin, sends in a letter from manager of a theater in Duluth, Minnesota, and writes:

> Am enclosing letter from an exhibitor in West Duluth which, I think, speaks for itself. To my mind it is just such managers as these who produce the genus crank-turner. This type of manager stifles, or at least retards the advance of competency in operators. I would be glad to see your opinion of the attached letter expressed in the department, and would ask only that the name be withheld.

The letter in question reads:

> In reply to yours of the 5th inst., will say that I am in need of an operator; that is, I am going to make a change, as the one I now have is getting very slack in his work. I want a man I can depend on; one who is not afraid of work—not merely a crank turner. I pay my operator $10 a week and expect him to help with the other work. If you would like to come up here on the above terms, let me know at once, or come.

I cannot express my opinion of this proposition, because the managing editor would not stand for this kind of language in the paper. Moreover, the ink would turn green, whereas all the ink in the department is supposed to be black. The cast-iron nerve of a "manager" who "wants a man he can depend on," and "one who is not afraid of work and not merely a crank turner," and whom he expects to help with the other work, to offer the munificently splendid and sublimely magnificent salary (salary is good) of $10 a week! Men of this type are not managers. They are not even good imitations. I presume this manager won't like this line of talk, for facts do sometimes hurt. But even in a small city like Duluth no man could live decently on the sum of $10 per week, much less support a family.

Publishing Addresses

James S. Gordon, Minnedosa, Manitoba, Canada, says:

> I am glad you have discovered the two books, "Lessons in Practical Electricity" and the "Electric Motor." I notice these books are by separate authors and publishers. Would it not be a good scheme to get the addresses and publish them in the department as it would then relieve you of all trouble?

Yes it would relieve me from a lot of trouble all right, because I have had to handle a whole lot of correspondence and money since I recommended those two books, but, brother Gordon, I would be right there infringing upon the advertising department and the advertising manager would proceed to bounce a brick off my ivory-topped dome. Sorry, old man, but, much as I would like to, it cannot be did. If it could be there would be a lot of them here with bells on every week, each with his name and address and a demand that it be published. The total result would be instead of paying $3.50 subscription price for the Moving Picture World you would pay probably more than twice that amount.

No Harm Done.

R. J. Hawkins, Lincoln, California, says:

> Just a word from a small Western town. Am operating a Motiograph 1912 model, and have just noticed something that worries me, even though I see no ill effects from it. By turning the crank until the intermittent sprocket is in motion and then holding the flywheel still I can turn the intermittent sprocket a distance equal to almost three-quarters of the space between two teeth. How can this be possible and not show on the screen? I thread in frame by having my portable lamp connected through a snap switch fastened to the machine so that it is close to my left hand.

The lost motion in the intermittent when it is off the lock amounts to nothing. Some of the Power's Six machine intermittent sprockets will turn almost one-fourth of a revolution when the sprocket is off the lock, but that cuts no figure. I cannot explain it to you, but if you will take the lid off your intermittent casing, you can see for yourself just how the thing works.

Wishes to Co-operate.

J. E. Robin, sales manager of the Precision Machine Company, desires this department to announce to all managers and operators that the manufacturers of the Simplex machine are desirous of extending their services to all operators and users of the Simplex, and earnestly request users of their machine to co-operate with them to the end that the service be improved in every possible way. All of which is very commendable on the part of the Precision Machine Company.

Automatic Dowser.

Fred R. Klink, Canton, Ohio, forwards for inspection a working model of his new invention known as the Alhambra Automatic Dowser. I have not had this device actually tried out, because I think it is unnecessary to do so. The operation is so simple, and so positive that there is no question but what the device would work, and work perfectly, when properly installed on any make of machine. It consists primarily of two parts, the first being a dowser, (1), held normally open by pin B, made to engage with the stem of the dowser by spring A, which holds the dowser normally in an upright position. Pin B is controlled by electro magnet 2 which pulls magnet bar 3 to which pin B is attached inward when current is supplied to the magnet, thus releasing the dowser and allowing it to fall by its own weight. 4 is a buzzer which gives an alarm when the dowser drops. This part of the device is attached, by means of screws, to the lamp house, so that the dowser will fall in front of the condensing lenses, and cut off the light, should the film break. 5 is a roller which is attached in such manner that it is held upright by the film between the lower sprocket and the fire trap of the lower magazine.

A wire attaches at 6, extending to the binding post of electro magnet 2. Lever 7 is held away from binding post 6 when roller 5 is held upright by the film, and post 6 is insulated from lever 7. The wire from the battery attaches to lever 7 and the circuit is completed when lever 7 touches post 6. It will thus be seen that should the film break, roller 5 would be instantly released, whereupon it is thrown around by spring 8, so that lever 7 makes contact with post 6, thus completing the circuit, upon which electro magnet 2 yanks bar 3, carrying pin B, inward, and releases the dowser, which automatically drops by gravity.

This all sounds rather complicated, but it is really very simple, and, moreover, it is positive in its action. The device is both mechanically and electrically very well made, is nickel-plated, and, taken altogether, is a very practical device which will, in the judgment of the editor, deliver the goods, and instantly shut off the light when the film breaks, or when the take-up of the machine fails to operate and take up the film properly.

A Good Bunch.

Reading, Pa., encloses 25 cents for the list of questions and says:

> The boys in this little city are a good bunch, but at times they seem a little dead. Our projection, as a whole, is very good, but we have the stuff you call "rotten" with us.

The brother then goes on to answer question No. 18, whereas we have already sent the answer to question 26 to the printer, and will attend to question 25 next. Readers should consider that there are always about three answers at the printer's, and govern themselves accordingly.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

THE RESURRECTION OF CALEB WORTH (Edison), April 14.—A pleasing and meritorious visualization, that carries with it sympathy for the leading role, the old bank president, who, his colleagues imagine, has outgrown his usefulness. Many touching scenes are shown. William West portrays the title role in a masterly manner, and Bessie Learn as his daughter is graciously sweet. The acting on the part of all the cast is adequate. A picture that is above the average.

BUSINESS AND LOVE (Lubin), April 14.—This photoplay, written by E. W. Sargent and directed by Arthur Hotaling, concerns a peddler who goes to Broken L ranch to sell goods. While he and Jolly May, the cook, are transacting business the cowboys torment Izzy and insist on paying for what the cook buys. They shoot him up. Izzy purchases a couple of guns and returns to make the boys dance to his music. He puts a bullet through his foot and the cook nurses him, making the boys jealous. Afterward they are married. James Hodges as Izzy Leopold and Mae Hotely as Jolly May play the leads. A good comedy.

THE PICTURESQUE COAST OF CATALONIA (Pathe), April 14.—On the same reel with "The Ruins of Angkor." This film is in natural colors and shows some of the beautiful castles for which Spain is noted.

THE RUINS OF ANGKOR, INDIA (Pathe), April 14.—This film is taken from the architectural record. It shows the ruins of glorious temples erected in the ancient city of Angkor. Among the scenes are the Terrace of Elephants, built about the tenth century, The King of the Lepers, The God Buddha, The Indian God of Gods, etc., etc.

THE PEACEMAKER'S PAY (Lubin), April 14.—This comedy picture is written by Frank Griffin and produced by Arthur Hotaling. The leading character is a henpecked husband. His name is Henry, which is rather coincidental. A quiet little poker game is the theme of this serio-tragic plot. Henry wins but loses, when he looks at the clock and realizes he is ninety minutes off the schedule allowed by his wife to "get in." He gets in finally as does a friend. This is where the comedy gets in also. The acting is adequate.

PIERRE, OF THE NORTH (Essanay), April 14.—A story of the northwest woods which is gripping and out of the ordinary. Richard C. Travers portrays the character of Pierre Vignault, a trapper, and Gerda Holmes essays the wife of Rene Bennett, another trapper. Both are fortunate in obtaining the pelt of a silver fox, for which there is a prize offering. The complications and the finale are satisfactorily developed. This is a strong and gripping picture throughout.

A ROMANCE OF THE FOREST RESERVE (Selig), April 14.—William Alfred Cory is the author and William Duncan is the director. There is in existence a law prohibiting the owner of flocks of sheep, goats or herds of cattle grazing on the National Reserve. Elmer Benson (Lester Cuneo), a ranger, discovers while riding his division in the National forest (prohibited territory), that David Fletcher (Francis Wheelock) is encroaching upon the reserve. He has become interested in Fletcher's stepdaughter, Barbara, who is being ill-treated. He finds that his orders are disregarded and to exhibit his authority arrests the foreman. He is attacked and bound in his cabin; a dynamite cartridge is exploded with the intention of wrecking this cabin. Barbara succeeds in releasing him at the critical moment and then they hunt up a preacher.

WHIFFLES' AFFINITY (Pathe), April 15.—On the same reel with "The Flowers That Bloom in the Spring." Whiffles and his wife conduct a small store. His wife becomes jealous over his fitting the leading lady of a burlesque company with gloves. He delivers the gloves and receives a kiss from the painted lips of his affinity. Imagine the finish when his wife discovers the impress of the painted lips on his cheek. This is an amusing number.

FLOWERS THAT BLOOM IN THE SPRING (Pathe), April 15.—This picture is an educational one. Though not altogether new it is very interesting, showing as it does the development of the cherry blossoms, the begonia, the martagon lily and the geranium, blooming gradually until they finally burst forth in all their glory.

AND HE CAME BACK (Essanay), April 15.—This is a side-splitting comedy, showing how a woman attempted to convert and how she succeeded in not curing her husband (her second), who was much peeved when he discovered his wife had decorated their rooms with her first husband's photographs, and he proceeds to destroy them. In pique she starts home to mother, when she meets a would-be actor who resembles her former husband and she bribes him to impersonate Mr. Firstchoice. For a time Mr. Secondchoice has laughable experiences, but in the finale he is victorious.

THE CHICKEN INSPECTOR (Vitagraph), April 15.—This is a superior comedy by Roy L. MacCardell, directed by Wallie Van and Wilfrid North. Wallie Van plays the leading comedy part, Willie Wildwave, and his home town is Jimpsonville. He visits New York and purchases a "Chicken Inspector" badge. He works it on the butcher, the restaurant keeper, seminary girls and the visiting burlesque show. He gives the town the liveliest time and biggest laugh Jimpsonville experienced. Finally they get his number, 23.

LO, THE POOR INDIAN (Edison), April 15.—Written by Carlton S. King and directed by C. Jay Williams. This is an amusing and legitimate comedy in which the author plays the title role, Mr. Lo, and what Mr. Lo doesn't succeed in accomplishing through his ignorance of pale-face ways is hardly worth mentioning. He is rescued from the pathless wilderness by A. Hunter (William Wadsworth) and is used as an object lesson in a lecture. But poor Lo gets tangled up with a quart of fire water, and in his untutored way starts to clean up things with a carving knife, causing the lecturer to proclaim that the grandson of Chingachgook might be some speed on his native heath, but is not a household pet.

A PAGE FROM YESTERDAY (Selig), April 15.—Written and produced by Walter Clark Bellows, and heralded as a troubled romance. The cast is made up of Clifford Bruce, an artist; Ralph Delmore, a paralytic father; Harry Vosburgh, his son, and Adrienne Kroell and Alma Russell as his two daughters. This is evidently intended to be a pretentious picture—perhaps it is. The production is commendable, artistically considered, but the plot as developed on the screen is unpleasant and inconsistent.

A QUACK AND THE WOULD-BE SUICIDE (Melies), April 16.—A half-reel comedy number of about ordinary interest, the settings and photography being handled with characteristic care and attention to details.

BATTY BILL'S PERTINACITY (Melies), April 16.—This, on same reel with above, shows an eccentric actor in a peck of trouble over a girl. Falling furniture and a final resting place in the dump heap are features of this, which brings considerable laughter.

HIGH LIFE HITS SLIPPERY SLIM (Essanay), April 16.—This is a combination of the ordinary Western comedy with eccentric photography and chase scenes. Slim is given a treatment by the doctor while sleeping in a barrel, and proceeds to make things hum around the countryside. This is fairly amusing, particularly to young observers.

THE FLIRT'S REPENTANCE (Selig), April 16.—A story, written by James Oliver Curwood, apparently dated in Civil War times. The girl, after causing a duel by her flirtations, takes the place of her lover and receives a mortal wound at the hands of his rival. This tragic number is well presented and holds the attention strongly.

MELODY AND ART (Biograph), April 16.—A strong story of Bohemian life. The musician and girl artist live in the same apartment house. Their love develops, but a second artist induces the girl to pose for him. The scenes in the studio, where the girl slashes the painting after the second artist tells her she cannot paint, are well handled. This makes a very good offering.

THE KISS (Vitagraph), April 16.—This number, featuring Margaret Gibson and George Holt, tells an entertaining story of the hopes and aspirations of a girl clerk in a department store. The settings and photography are excellent and the plot true to life. All of the incidents follow in a convincing manner. A good release.

A CHANCE IN LIFE (Lubin), April 17.—This starts off with an unusual situation, in which the woman with unbalanced mind mistakes the young convict for her missing son. At the girl's behest, the convict assumes the part. The photography is good and some stirring situations come up at the railway station. The suspense is well maintained in the later scenes. A good release.

INNOCENT, BUT AWKWARD (Vitagraph), April 17.—Sidney Drew appears in this number as an eccentric professor who carries mice, birds and other pets around with him. The humor of this is very rich and appealing. It is well photographed and makes an excellent comedy release.

RED HEAD AND MA'S SUITORS (Selig), April 17.—In this half reel a mischievous girl plays numerous pranks on her mother's suitors. The humor never becomes uproarious, but it is quite pronounced in places and brings some laughter.

DOC YAK, OVER THE FENCE AND OUT (Selig), April 17.—A few of Sidney Smith's animated drawings, run as a tail piece to above.

A RACE WITH THE LIMITED (Kalem), April 17.—In this railroad story the light-headed girl operator mixes up the orders and nearly causes a wreck in consequence. The hero averts this by a dash on his motorcycle. The newest feature in this is where he moves the semaphore arm by shooting at it. The picture as a whole is one of about average merit.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE RATTLER (Essanay), April 18.—A thrilling Western drama featuring G. M. Anderson. The sheriff is Carl Stockdale and Billy is his deputy. The trouble is over a valuable case of jewels which is to be delivered. There is an almost murder over the delivery. Billy succeeds in his mission and is promoted to the sheriff's office for his honest efforts.

A PRINCESS OF THE DESERT (Edison), April 18.—This is a beautiful picture to visualize owing to the lavish oriental costumes and setting. Especially the palace and throne chamber scenes. The moonlight opening of the picture on the desert is impressive. Marc MacDermott and Mary Fuller are in the leading roles. The photography and light effects are flawless. This is a strong and beautiful production.

GUARANTEED RAINPROOF (Lubin), April 18.—This is on the same reel with "A Strenuous Ride" and concerns a man who purchases a suit of clothes. On this the comedy hinges. It is a real laugh producer.

MIXED MAILS (Biograph), April 18.—On the same reel with "An Ambitious Pa." The comedy in this picture versifies the caption, and the conception is a happy one and gains hearty and deserved laughter. It is well made and acted.

AN AMBITIOUS PA (Biograph), April 18. This is on the same reel with "Mixed Mails," and is an enjoyable and laughable little farce comedy.

A STRENUOUS RIDE (Lubin), April 18. On the same reel with "Guaranteed Rainproof." A series of mechanical cartoons.

THE FIGHT ON DEADWOOD TRAIL (Kalem), April 18.—An Indian story that is full of plenty of excitement; it is full of fights from start to finish, also robbery and treachery. Princess Mona Darkfeather plays the Indian maiden. To those that like shooting and riding scenes this will prove thrilling.

SONNY JIM AT THE NORTH POLE (Vitagraph), April 20. A heart touching photodrama in which Sonny and his dog Shep play the leading roles. Sonny's daddy reads in the morning paper an article concerning the North Pole, and explains it to Sonny, who unfortunately has been reprimanded for some trival mishaps at breakfast and told that if such things occur again Shep will be sent away. In desperation he and Shep start out to find the North Pole. How they succeed is very "gripping." This is a beautiful number in all respects.

PATHE'S WEEKLY, NO. 32 (Pathe), April 20.—This full reel contains many interesting topical scenes, the most gripping of which is a long series showing the sailing of Uncle Sam's war ships to Mexican ports. This portion gained loud and long applause.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE STOLEN SLIPPER (Edison), April 20.—This is the fourth of the series of the Octavius Amateur stories, and is very entertaining and embraces considerable comedy in its construction. This is written on a real occurrence that took place in New York City in the near past. A good offering.

THE SCAR (Biograph), April 20.—A very strong story and cleverly produced. Jealousy on the part of the wife of a leading politician is the foundation of the plot. There are good strong scenes, and able acting combined. Claire McDowell, Joseph McDermott and Kate Bruce are the principals and do good work.

Licensed Specials

THE SECRET VAULT (Kleine-Cines), April 14.—An exceedingly strong and fairly developed plot concerning political affairs, that is intense and interesting. It concerns and exposes the grafting methods resorted to by unscrupulous rings in political circles. There is an interesting love story that is closely allied in the plot. Much that is intense and gripping is embraced in the scenes. In every respect it is well worth viewing.

HE NEVER KNEW (Vitagraph), April 14. A special feature in two parts. It would have been a shocking mistake; a loathsome and unheard of marriage. They were of course both ignorant of their relationship, but death happily intervenes and "He Never Knew." This picture was written by Bessie Boniel and directed by Ralph Ince. Although such a combination of circumstances might possibly happen in the course of human events, it is not a pleasant visualization to the audience as a whole. The acting is commendable especially on the part of Anita Stewart, ably supported by James Morrison. Rose Tapley and Julia Swayne Gordan were at their best.

THE NAVAJO BLANKET (Kalem), April 15.—A two-part Indian romance featuring Princess Mona Darkfeather. The cast also contains Art Ortega, Big Moon, Eagle Wing and Jim Davis. It depicts the tragedy of the weaving of a Navajo blanket, embroiling the Shoshones, the Apaches and the Navajoes in a struggle of the three nations for supremacy. The entire cast is made up of Indians. The acting, scenery and photography are up to the standard.

A FATHER'S HEART (Lubin), April 15.—Another of the prevalent two-reel offerings that has a padded-out plot that embraces in its tiresome unfolding unfaithfulness in a trusted wife, a heart broken husband, etc., etc. This picture has thrilling scenes though it is full of inconsistencies.

STRENGTH OF THE FAMILY TIES (Lubin), April 16.—This story, written by Shannon Fife, has a very involved plot, in which a dissipated father loses track of his girl baby, after his wife's death, and adopts a son. In later years the girl appears, having been raised by a foster mother. There are numerous love affairs, all skilfully handled, but requiring close attention on the part of the observer to avoid confusion of mind. The scenes at the banquet in the last reel are the best, and contain good suspense. None of the characters are very sympathetic. The photography is good.

A MAD LOVE (Pathe), April 16.—A two-reel number in which the photography and settings are very pleasing. The story, however, is of a distinctly unpleasant sort. It shows how the unsuccessful suitor for a girl's hand becomes madly jealous and tries to kill her husband and herself. After wrecking a balloon, in which they were all riding, he is sent to an asylum. On his release he procures a gun and renews his efforts to start trouble. There is an auto chase in which two machines go over a cliff. Pictorially this is very interesting, but it is depressing and morbid in theme.

A QUESTION OF HATS AND GOWNS (Edison), April 17.—A two-reel number, with Miriam Nesbitt and Augustus Phillips in the leads. This story of the country town girl, who becomes a milliner in order to win the love she craves, strikes a strong note of human appeal. Miss Nesbitt gives one of the most finished performances we have seen on the screen. Her handling of the lovelorn girl, from graduation days until she becomes a striking beauty, is intelligent and appealing. The story develops naturally and has a lot of human nature in it. An unusually pleasing number.

THE WINNER (Essanay), April 17. A two-reel low comedy number, with Eddie Redway, Louise Willis and others in the cast. The humor is of a rough sort and includes electioneering, pie throwing, wrestling and the like. There are moments when some of the scenes are very laughable, but the fun is of a distinctly rough house character and not adapted to the best houses. The photography is fair.

THE GHOST (Pathe), April 18. This is an American feature in three reels and is a superior production in its entirety. M. O. Penn accomplishes some wonderful silent acting in this offering, especially where his conscience drives him mad when he imagines he sees his brother's ghost, whom he had left to perish in the quick sands. Crane Wilbur, William Riley Hatch, Logan Paul and Clare Rea were the other leading characters, and the talent displayed by all is above the standard. The plot is laid in the time of the buccaneers, early in the 19th century.

THE VANITY CASE (Vitagraph), April 18.—A special two-reel feature that contains an interesting plot that is located in a home of wealth. Through an innocent mistake a young girl is intimidated into becoming an accomplice of a rascally young man and made to commit a theft. The story is well carried out and splendidly acted by James Marrison, Gladden James and Dorothy Kelly in the leading roles. A splendid production.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN, NO. 9 (Selig), April 20.—A special two-reel picture which is also heralded with a sub-title, "The Spellbound Multitude." The spectacular merit of this effort can not be questioned, nor can the acting and costuming be criticised. The plot and the direction, however, are full of inconsistencies that are glaring. The photography is fairly done.

THE SECRET FORMULA (Kalem), April 20.—A special two-reel drama embracing a strong plot that is somewhat complicated, but it has been cleverly directed and acted in all respects. It is evident that nothing has been neglected to make this picture a feature offering. Much credit is due to the actors and producers as a whole in this offering.

Independent

HER AWAKENING (Princess), April 17.—This is an entertaining picture which carries with it a lesson to girls who are forced by circumstances to hold positions in offices where they are at the mercy of unprincipled employers. Muriel Ostriche plays the part of a little stenographer, in a natural and artistic manner. She is the oldest of three children, whom a loving and widowered father is attempting to the best of his abilities to provide for. A well made and worthy offering on any program.

THE OLD MAN (Reliance), April 17.—A peculiar sort of plot this, with the cast made up of the leading people of the Reliance stock, the majority of whom have little to do. Henry Walthall is the grouchy old man and Dorothy Gish the maid-of-all-work. The finale is satisfactory and touching.

COLLECTING THE RENT (Royal), April 18. A very laughable rough comedy which introduces several diversified characters attempting to collect rent money from a garrulous and parsimonious old maid. After the boss, the stenographer and prizefighter fail it is amusing to see dear little Milo get the money and a job for life.

UP AND DOWN (Apollo), April 19.—One of Fred Mace's comedy mix ups and it is up and down, in and out and all over before it is finished. In the closing the whole of the cast is in the "hole." This is one of the best put over by Mr. Mace. A great laugh creator.

MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 14 (Reliance), April 20.—This is a series of happenings which takes place on board the battleship Arkansas, to which she has been invited to visit. She is chaperoned by her aunt, Mrs. Knickerbocker. The officers vie with one another in making the visit enjoyable. It is educational in some respects to the spectators. Miss Phillips seems to be acquiring an effusiveness in her work that unless curbed by her director, will eventually prove disastrous.

THE UNREDEEMED PLEDGE (Majestic), April 21.—This is a very interesting story. It concerns a family consisting of a father, mother and daughter. An old friend of the father's returns from the mining regions of the West, and displays golden nuggets which he has brought back with him. This imbues the father with the spirit of unrest, and taking with him a beautiful collie dog he secretly departs to search for gold. Ill luck follows him and he pledges his dog to a storekeeper. Later, he discovers gold in quantities. An accident entombs him. The dog is instrumental in saving him. A good picture.

WHEN ALGY FROZE UP (Thanhouser), April 24.—A comedy wherein the plot is laid during an old-fashioned winter as the mise-en-scene, by Lloyd F. Donergan. An ambitious mother afflicted with more money than brains decides to marry her daughter to an English nobleman. She induces him to come to America where he meets the daughter, who of course dislikes him. With the assistance of her friends and her father, they make it so unpleasant for the mother's choice that he concludes to beat it for dear old England. A laugh creating offering.

HER FIGHTING CHANCE (American), April 24.—Jim Corbin, a novelist (Ed Coxen), and his wife (Josephine Ditt), become estranged on account of not having mutual tastes. It is the old story of the husband meeting and becoming enamoured with Nell Dare, a young writer (Winifred Greenwood). The picture is interesting from the fact that it covers an immense amount of territory to develop the plot. During his absence the wife tries her hand and writes a book that is the sensation of the season. The ending is satisfactory. The picture is finely produced.

THE SMOULDERING SPARK (American), April 24.—This photoplay tells of a derelict's regeneration. The director has shown creditable discrimination in this visualization. The derelict sacrifices himself to shield the dissolute scion of a wealthy family. A wager is made between the father of the dissolute son and an intimate friend that when once a man is down he is unredeemable. The derelict not only proves that he still possesses a smouldering spark, but saves the son of his benefactor. There is a lesson in this picture.

THE STRATEGY OF CONDUCTOR 786 (Thanhouser), April 26. The novelty feature of this picture pertains in the fact that the scenes all transpire either in or out of a suburban street car. The conductor of the car takes upon himself to assist a young lady, one of his regular passengers, in her love affair. He succeeds in his mission and "gets even" with father. Riley Chamberlain and Miss Rey are the principals. This is amusing and interesting.

THE OLD MAID'S TRIUMPH (Powers), April 27. A laughable comedy showing how a burlesque company was frozen out and prevented from giving a show in a rube town, by the wives and mothers of the male contingent who attempted to flock to the town hall to have a "lookin."

IN THE BARRACKS OF THE ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE OF CANADA (Powers), April 27.—On the same reel with "The Old Maid's Triumph." This is a well made picture, edifying and instructive. It illustrates barrack life in all its various phases.

TEMPER VERSUS TEMPER (Imp), April 27. In this story Ethel Grandin has the role of a young woman with a violent temper who falls in love with and marries the doctor called in to prescribe for her. The picture will interest and at times amuse. Hobart Henley is the doctor who tries the scheme of fighting fire with fire, and displays even more violence than did his wife, with most salutary results. The picture is well staged by Ray Smallwood.

UNIVERSAL IKE AND THE SCHOOL BELLE (Universal Ike), April 28.—There are things in it that will astonish laughter from any audience. The reel is a bit long, but will make an excellent offering.

WOMEN AND ROSES (Nestor), April 29. A pretty, conventional picture by Wallace Reid, adapted from Browning's poem. There is nothing in it that is extraordinarily convincing or interesting. It is well done, however; in fact, visually, it is beautiful. It will please those who are fond of displays of roses, as this seems to be the predominating feature of the offering. It is a dainty and pleasing number for any program.

AN EPISODE (Rex), April 30. Phillips Smalley and Ella Hall appear in this film-sketch, written by Calder Johnston. The piece has a Mexican setting and is attractively pictured. It concerns the love of two women for a man, both of whom he casts off. A slight plot agreeably presented.

A FATAL WEDDING (Sterling), April 30.—This introduces Ford Sterling in a rapid-fire one reel offering. All of the first part of this offering is very laughable, but toward the last the pie-throwing and other sloppy scenes interfere with the humor, as invariably happens when these things are overdone. The photography is good.

CUCKOOVILLE GOES SKATING (Frontier), April 30.—Pretzel does a good business in this film, selling roller skates. The humor is of an eccentric sort and rather rough in places. The chief drawback is lack of a definite plot.

HER HUSBANDS (Nestor), May 1.—This is an amusing offering in which Eddie Lyons agrees to pose as the young husband of a woman at the seashore. He regrets this step when the real husband appears. The latter shoots up the big hotel and some very funny situations occur at the close. Good comedy.

THE BUCKET SHARPER (Joker), May 2.—In this number Mike and Jake run a bucket shop and are relieved of their wealth by Light-Fingered Fanny. Low comedy which becomes amusing in one or two places. It lacks plot interest.

THE RUNAWAY (Frontier), May 2.—This is the story of an unwilling stepson. He quarrels violently with his stepfather and thinks he has killed him. This leads him to run away, but later developments bring the story to a happy close. The plot is not strong, but it holds the interest and the photography is good.

HIS SERVANT (Eclair), May 3.—This is a financial story in which O. A. C. Lund plays the role of a good and faithful servant. He saves his master from being swindled by a gang of bond sharks. The auto chase was exciting and, while the plot is slight, it gets up a fair degree of suspense.

CHARLIE AND A DOG (Crystal), May 3.—In this comedy number Charlie DeForrest makes an effort to realize on his health policy. He pretends to get hydrophobia from the bull terrier. The chase on the part of the dog gets to be extremely funny and will draw a great deal of laughter from almost any audience. One of the best things of the kind we have seen.

ALMOST A HERO (Universal Ike), May 5.—In this characteristic number Ike plays a joke on the hero-sheriff, by planting a scarecrow where it will cause the most excitement. The humor is of the familiar brand and is helped considerably in this instance by good photography.

ROLL YOUR PEANUT (Joker), May 6.—In this number, written by Grace Cunard, the old election bet, in which the loser must roll a peanut around a block, is put into motion. It is full of amusing incidents and makes a novel offering of this kind.

HIS STRENUOUS HONEYMOON (Nestor), May 8.—Eddie Lyons appears as a young bridegroom in this number, his better half being played by Victoria Forde. Jealousy and counterfeit money bring up some complications, but as a whole the reel is only a moderate success from the standpoint of laughter.

THE OUTLAW'S DAUGHTER (Frontier), May 9.—Rather unsatisfactory Western. The introduction of the story is obscure, leaving the observer much in the dark. Two bandits hiding from the authorities manifest almost too much nervousness to be successful at their chosen calling. There are excellent photographs of a primitive country.

Independent Specials

THE STILETTO (Reliance), April 18.—A two-reel melodrama by Frank E. Woods (old Spec), which has evidently been written to order to fit Courtenay Foote. It is based on the vendetta. While the picture is interesting, it is void of "grip" and "punch" of a convincing nature. Lack of detail in the direction is noticeable to the spectator. Too much premeditation in several scenes wreck the surprises before they get over. The cameraman's work is adequate and no fault can be found with the acting.

THE TIE THAT BINDS (Majestic), April 19.—This two-reel drama visualizes existence in the lower walks of life. There are some striking scenes especially between Hogan (Lamar Johnstone), a former pugilist, and his rival for the affections of Molly McIntyre, when they come to blows. Molly accepts Hogan to later regret it. He attempts to rob the office and is sent to prison. Molly secures a divorce and marries McGuire. Here is where the "punch" comes in, as Hogan, by a hair-breadth, misses killing his own child. A very interesting picture.

FROM THE FLAMES (Thanhouser), April 21.—A two-part melodramatic picture play that contains intense and gripping scenes, which follow each other rapidly and consistently. It visualizes how a dissolute son comes to grief through an attempt, with the aid of a dishonest clerk, to destroy his father's last will. There is a spectacular fire scene in this picture that is wonderful. Everything considered, a superior production.

THE STRIKE (Thanhouser), April 21.—This superior two-reel picture illustrates the influence a strike agitator holds over unionism and how he can induce employes to inaugurate a strike against their own interests on trival matters. This is a strong picture and of much interest to labor organizations. A superior explosion and fire scene is involved in the plot.

A COMMON MISTAKE (Domino), April 23.—A two-reel photo production that is well acted in all its scenes and has a plot of merit and heart interest. A girl with an ambition which is discouraged by her father determines to make a try of it at least. After many disheartening days she succeeds and secures a talented husband. The obstinate father is obliged to acknowledge his mistake.

THE RIGHTFUL HEIR (Kay-Bee), April 24.—This is a two-reel piece of old-fashioned conventional melodrama with Irish trimmings. It is not without the usual improbabilities of the melodrama and the acting is just about fair.

A DIAMOND IN THE ROUGH (Majestic), April 26.—This is a rather superior two-reel Western picture, in which Eugene Palette plays the title role. Miriam Cooper, in the opposite leading part, portrays a character whose soul is wrapped up in cheap literature, and Edna Mae Wilson is the little level-headed sister. This photoplay is finely directed and contains many gripping scenes which hold the closest attention of the audience. Little Miss Wilson shows herself to be a fearless and excellent rider. At the finale she forces her sister to recognize the diamond in the rough.

LUCILLE LOVE, NO. 3 (Gold Seal), April 28.—This two-reel installment pictures the adventures of Grace Cunard, as Lucille, among the island natives. The chief presents her with a little white elephant on a chain, which saves her from death. There is also a live white elephant which the natives worship. Hugo again appears. The action seems a little forced at times, but the series has a certain spirit of adventure about it which appeals.

SHORTY'S ESCAPE FROM MATRIMONY (Broncho), April 29.—This four-reel sort of film still appeals to many motion picture patrons. The adventures of Shorty are interesting and entertaining and there can be no doubt that "Shorty" is a clever comedian. In this play he is at his best. Settings and photography are splendid. The play will be released in two installments.

THROUGH THE EYES OF THE BLIND (Imp), April 30.—In this two-reel drama Walter Miller, the former Biograph player, does good work as a blind man who through losing his direction enters the wrong house just after a murder has been committed. There are good situations and novel ones, too. The picture is well acted and should make a fair release.

THE TWO GUN MEN (Powers), May 1.—A two-reel number, with Edwin August as producer and principal actor. The father, a political grafter, raises the rent on certain tenements in the poor quarters. The son is an idol among the residents there and distributes his father's graft money with a lavish hand. Later, when the father's enemies are closing in upon him, the son saves him from the Black Hand. The plot is extravagant and melodramatic in the extreme, but it is quite interesting.

THE TRAGEDY OF WHISPERING CREEK (Bison), May 2.— A two-reel number, written by Lon Chaney, with Pauline Bush and Murdock MacKenzie in the cast. The story is very uncertain in development, but has an unusually pleasing setting throughout the entire production. The backgrounds were selected with a good eye to artistic effects. The story is vague in places and the photography not quite up to standard. The closing scenes are of a tragical nature.

THE NATION'S PERIL (Bison), May 2.—A two-reel number, with William Clifford and Marie Wolcamp. The first reel develops an international intrigue of a complicated and not very interesting nature. The second reel has a lot of melodramatic action in it and contains one particularly thrilling scene, where the auto goes over a cliff. This has never been presented more realistically and is sufficient in itself to make the production an unusual one. Some of the photography is not quite up to standard.

THE PAWNS OF DESTINY (Victor), May 8.—An extended review of this excellent three-reel drama, written and produced by H. L. Solter, and in which Florence Lawrence and Matt Moore have the leads, will be found in another columns.

THE HOSTAGE (Dania Biofilm).—This four-part subject contains well-photographed views of a rocky ocean shore. The story is loosely jointed; there are several situations that do not convince. For instance, a mother permits kidnappers to enter her child's bedroom and take away the little one without making an outcry. She just faints. The two men take the child to the ground over ropes without disturbing anyone in the household—and it is not late at night. Then, again, it is hardly likely a bandit would send to the father of the child a note signed by himself and setting forth that in pursuance of his threat the child had been put to death. It was not clear why the police chief when he had recovered his child did not take her home over the same route as that by which he had arrived at the appointed place rather than to send a telegram for the police to come and get him. The foregoing are examples of carelessness in construction. The acting of the chief of police is good, that of many of the cast is indifferent. The child is notably weak, rarely missing an opportunity to look at the camera.

Albert Blinkhorn in Educationals

His Initial Release Is In Five Reels and Shows Interesting Pictures of the Capture of a Sea Elephant.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

UNDER the serial title of "Blinkhorn Natural History Travels," Albert Blinkhorn, president of the Hepworth American Film Corporation, is now showing to state rights buyers a five-reel production of unusual interest. It is Mr. Blinkhorn's initial release of a straight educational subject, but it is his intention to make a specialty of such pictures in the future. It is a noteworthy beginning. The picture is the result of a journey last summer along the rocky shores of Santa Catalina, Santa Barbara and, most important of all, about the Island of Guadalupe. The trip was inspired by a report of an old sailorman, who insisted that on the shore of the latter island could be found a herd of sea elephants, believed by many scientists to be extinct. The expedition was successful in every way, and the camera results prove that not only was the mariner in the right, but that the herd numbered about seventy-five. One sea elephant was caged and brought back to Los Angeles. He was not full grown, his weight being only 2,400 pounds. Some of these gentle creatures are said to bulk as large as five tons. The roping and caging of the big fellow forms one of the most interesting incidents in a film filled with good things.

A Monster at Rest.

An Unexecuted Threat.

Robert Cushman Murphy, curator of mammals in the Brooklyn Museum, has displayed the liveliest concern in the picture and has already engaged it for three lectures, the first one to be before the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences early in May. Mr. Murphy's interest in the picture was one of the impelling factors in determining Mr. Blinkhorn to acquire the world's rights on these five reels. Mr. Murphy is the author of a thirty-page pamphlet, "Notes on the Sea Elephant," which, under date of February 20, 1914, was extracted from the bulletin of the American Museum of Natural History.

The opening of the picture shows the expedition laying in stores aboard the power craft Nora, in which the trip is to be made. The little vessel with its crew of a dozen men passes in close to Santa Catalina, enough so to get an intimate view of great clouds of seagulls. Then on to Santa Barbara, where some of the men go ashore and cross the island to a point where it is impossible to land from the sea. By means of ropes photographers are let down the cliffs and close-up views are taken of seagulls. They are shown hatching from the egg, then we see them at the age of three weeks and again half grown. The chief value of the trip here, however, was in the remarkable pictures obtained of the seals, there being literally thousands of them. There are views of the mother seal teaching the young to swim. The littler ones are taken out into the heavy surf and compelled to make shore as best they can. If an unusually heavy roller forces the youngster under, the mother takes a grip on its neck and pulls it back to the surface. We see the entrances of the unnavigable, cavernous tunnels under the cliffs where the seal much do congregate. The glossy skinned animals are as tame as they are intelligent.

The expedition secured many pictures of the pelicans. They are shown as they emerge from the egg and in various stages of growth. One interesting fact in connection with these large birds is that they cannot fly until full grown. Like the seal they do not avoid human society, making no effort to get away from the members of the expedition. On Flea Island unusual views were secured of the cormorant.

On San Miguel Island photographs were taken of many sea lions. Great herds of them are shown in the surf and on the rocks, remarkable agility being displayed by these apparently clumsy animals. While the seals are tame, they will fight when they think their young ones are threatened. Here also are shown the gathering of abelone, a shellfish with meat much resembling that of an oyster. These sometimes grow to a length of a foot.

The Nora then made a straight jump of 500 miles south to the Isle of Guadalupe, which was the real destination of the party. Anchoring in what they named Cabrillo Harbor, two men went ashore to explore. It did not take them long to locate a herd of seventy-five of the monster sea elephants, and the entire crew went ashore and pitched a tent. In cleaning off an old bolder near an abode house one of the men discovered chiseled into the rock the names of four men, Americans, as the outlines of a flag plainly indicated, and the date 1807. The camera brings out the inscription.

There are many views of the sea elephants. They are not pugnacious; but some of the larger ones manifest a disposition to fight if they are annoyed. Where the seal has four flippers the elephant has but two, much resembling the human hand. Its method of locomotion reminds one of a caterpillar. It was the intention of the leaders of the party to shoot one of the animals and to bring back the skin and skeleton. Their hearts failed them, however, when about to put the intention into execution, and instead they determined to capture one and bring it back alive. This was no simple matter. The picture shows in great detail the battle that resulted when an attempt was made to rope a 2,400-pounder. It took ten men six hours to get the less than full-grown elephant into a skeleton cage.

There are many fine pictures in these five reels—pictures of heavy surf and of rocks inhabited by great droves of seals and cormorants. The photography is good, the camera having been manipulated by an experienced man. The interest is sustained throughout. "The Capture of a Sea Elephant" will do more than entertain any audience. It will instruct.

ECLECTIC SUBJECTS IN THE HEARST PAPERS.

In collaboration with the Eclectic Film Company, the Hearst newspapers throughout the country are publishing, in serial form, the multiple reel features which are being regularly released by the Eclectic Film Company. The first of these subjects was "Loyalty," an elaborately colored film which is made by the Eclectic natural color process. The popularity of this reciprocal publicity arrangement between the Eclectic Film Company and the Hearst newspapers is evidenced by the multitude of orders for bookings which are being daily received at the different Eclectic Feature Film Exchanges.

The next story published by the Hearst newspapers is "War." This is the same feature that is being shown in motion pictures under the title, "War is Hell." This film is particularly appropriate at this time, owing to the tremors which are now filling the air with rumors of war. "War is Hell" has many features that commend themselves to the moving picture fans.

GEORGE KLEINE VISITS NEW YORK.

George Kleine made a flying trip to New York last week in connection with the opening of the new theater and other matters touching upon the release of some big features in the near future.

Nicholas Power Surprised.

His Associates Celebrate His return From Abroad by Dining and Entertaining Him—A Rare Occasion.

THE friends and associates of Nicholas Power, president of the Nicholas Power Company, put one over on him on the evening of Saturday, April 18, at the establishment of Mine Host Mouquin in Sixth Avenue. Mr. Power knew he was going to a dinner on Saturday evening. He had told Edward Earl, the treasurer of the Power Company, that he would be delighted to join four or five of the "boys" in a little celebration, which he was given to understand was to be in honor of his return on the preceding Tuesday from a two months' sojourn abroad. Somehow Mr. Power had the impression the affair was to take place at the St. Regis Hotel. When he appeared there he found only Mr. Earl, who explained in a way that was perfectly satisfactory to the guest of the evening that he was to meet the "boys" at Mouquin's. When Mr. Power walked into the Red Room at 7:30 o'clock instead of four or five he found ninety awaiting him. It is likely he will for many a day remember the reception.

Captain Arthur J. Lang, the executive secretary of the company, was toastmaster. With him to greet Mr. Power were Mr. Earl, John F. Skerrett, general manager of the company; Will C. Smith, assistant general manager; S. S. Cassard, purchasing agent; L. W. Atwater, sales manager; William F. Rock, president of the Vitagraph Company, an old friend of the guest of the evening; E. B. "Farmer" Dunn, H. T. Edwards, S. D. Cseszsnak, A. E. Jones, A. Costello, F. Lowenstein, Kenneth A. Earl, F. I. Thompson, S. B. Emmert, Charles Bobst, J. R. O'Neil, W. D. Alling, S. H. Nicholas Power.

Captain Lang had arranged matters, and with military precision. Things began to happen right away. There were songs to be sung and in between times individual greetings for the guest of the evening. Mr. Power remained in his place of honor until he could no longer withstand the inward pressure. He made a circuit of the tables, greeting each one. When in about the center of the room he was suddenly surrounded. "For he's a jolly good fellow!" came from the group. Instantly every man was on his feet with glass raised and in full-lunged intonation "bore down" on the old familiar air. There was an electric quality, a spontaneity, in the action that spelled unmistakable sincerity.

Mr. Power in responding to the toast "Nicholas Power the man," told how he had been successfully trapped by his friends. "It has been more than a surprise to me," he said, "and I heartily appreciate it. I thank you one and all from the bottom of my heart. I can't say any more."

When coffee and cigars were reached there appeared a very long dark personification of the Motion Picture arrayed in the habiliaments of the nursery. On his front he wore a strange device warning speakers to refrain from intimating he was still in his infancy. Sandwiched in between the numbers of a most excellent entertainment were short talks by Sam Spedon, of the Vitagraph Company; H. B. Gregory, Mr. Earl, F. W. Swett, Mr. Skerrett and Fred Beecroft. Mr. Spedon praised Mr. Power and his work. Mr. Gregory spoke of the democratic methods employed by Mr. Power in the management and operation of his business. Mr. Earl, who was introduced as a man who always brought happiness and sunshine with him, explained how in his work on the board of strategy he had told Mr. Power nothing but the truth, the whole—well, he told him the truth, anyway. Mr. Swett was introduced as one who had represented Mr. Power all over the country, and expressed his gratification at having returned from a three months' trip in time to tender his respects to Mr. Power and the assembled guests. Mr. Skerrett told of the pleasant associations in the Nicholas Power Company. Mr. Beecroft started off just as if he were going to make a speech, but he disappointed his friends as he pleased those who did not know him by propounding a conundrum instead.

Captain Lang announced that Mr. Power had something to say before retiring. "I have only one or possibly two words to say," said the man who had been the recipient of so many congratulatory words during a long evening. "I heartily thank you all, one and all, from the bottom of my heart for this reception. I can't say anything further. I bid you goodnight."

For entertainment there were shown motion pictures of the reception of Mr. Power at the steamship, which were warmly received. The Vitagraph "Wild Animals at Large" kept the party in a roar, as did two Keystones, "Making a Living" and "Twenty Minutes of Love." Templer Saxe was in especially good voice and was compelled to respond to several encores. Many members of the White Rats furnished a long and most enjoyable programme.

It was late when goodnights were said. Many verbal bouquets were bestowed on Captain Lang, the chairman of the committee, for his all-around generalship both before and during the event—for event it was. In picture parlance there was action every minute. The dinner was excellent—from the standpoint of eatables as well as drinkables, as to the latter of which there was an especially wide and choice variety.

The committee aiding Captain Lang were Edward Earl, John Francis Skerrett, S. S. Cassard, J. C. Bell, A. D. Bell, William Barry, Will C. Smith and Lawrence W. Atwater.

Harry Handworth.

THE accompanying cut is a splendid and characteristic likeness of Harry Handworth, the well-known director formerly with Pathe, who will supervise the production of the newly formed Excelsior Film Company. During his recent visit to this city where he organized a well-balanced company of photo-players, his arm was nearly wrenched from its socket by friendly grips of his many admirers who wished him success in his new venture.

Harry Handworth.

Speaking of his company, Mr. Handworth said: "Our policy during the past three months has been one of 'Watchful Waiting,' watching the ever changing conditions in the moving picture field, and waiting for the 1st of May to begin operations. Our policy in the future will be the production of multiple reels of the highest order, in which Octavia Handworth, former Pathe star, will be featured: her many friends throughout the states will now be enabled to see her at her best.

"Three-reel features will be our standard, with an occasional four- or five-reel picture if the story warrants it. Padding and stretching a story will not be tolerated; our prospective buyers will be assured of three solid reels of action and story; our photography will be up to the Pathe standard, which insures a perfect and steady picture when projected. No money will be spared in the studio, a company of twelve players will comprise the roster, many of them well known as screen stars.

"The studio is located at beautiful Lake Placid, in the Adirondack Mountains, often referred to as the Switzerland of America."

Speaking of the condition of the film market Mr. Handworth said, "The five-, six-, seven- and eight-reel picture must go, except in rare cases; a story to run more than three reels must have exceptional merit. The public is tired of seeing a five- or six-reel picture that is not worth more than one or two reels, the filming of dramatic plays is carried to excess, many of these plays are not good enough for a half reel, yet many producers are running into sure destruction by releasing them as six-, seven- and sometimes eight-reel features. The photoplay public won't stand for that much longer. A change is ever occurring; two and three reels will predominate, but they must be "meaty" and contain a "punch" in every reel.

"The open market will shortly be an actual fact. Many association firms will put their product out independently and compete against each other. Merit will win, and it will be a survival of the fittest."

KING OF SIAM'S FAVORITE SPORT AT SOLAX.

Madame Blaché and the members of her company witnessed an interesting game of bicycle polo at the Solax studio during the staging of a coming multiple-reel photodrama by James Johnson. The polo players were members of the International Bicycle Polo team, which recently completed a tour around the world and was the pet diversion of the King of Siam for several months.

The same spirit of sportmanship that prompted the king and his court to wager high stakes on the result of the games and also caused the team to be delayed in Spain for almost a year while the Spaniards enjoyed the sport, quickly spread through the studio and the cameramen were ignored while the members of the company rooted for their favorite players.

The photodrama, which contains interesting scenes staged by Director Johnson on Broadway, the top of the Metropolitan Opera House, and the Brooklyn Bridge, will present Edwin Brandt of "The Garden of Allah" and "Svengali" fame in his well-known characterization of a hypnotist, and also a leap of more than one hundred feet made by one of Barnum and Bailey's famous acrobats from the roof of a building.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

GETTING READY FOR DAYTON.

Delegates Being Named by State Leagues for the Big Exhibitors' Convention—Trade Exposition Will be Comprehensive.

WHILE nothing of great importance has happened at Dayton during the past week in connection with the preparations for the coming National convention and the second International Exposition of Motion Picture Art, to be held in that city during the week of July 6, there is evidence of unusual activity among exhibitors throughout the country. In every state where conventions of state league organizations have been held delegates have been chosen to attend the Dayton meeting and individual exhibitors in large numbers have expressed a determination to accompany those delegations. During the month of May a number of important state conventions will be held and further delegates will be named. That there will be a full representation of all states at the fourth annual convention of the Motion Picture League of America there is not the least doubt.

Word comes from California that the California State League will charter a special train and bring a large delegation from the Coast states. Fifty exhibitors belonging to the California branch have signified their intention of making the trip; as many more are expected from Oregon and Washington, with other far west states still to be heard from.

The convenience of Dayton to the great body of exhibitors in the Middle West insures the attendance of hundreds who could not find time to make a longer trip. The convention committee has estimated that fully 6,000 exhibitors are within three hundred miles of the convention city and, while not all of them are members of the league, the opportunity to foregather with the enterprising men of the trade, to see the latest devices shown at the exposition and to get valuable information regarding the conduct of their business, will not be neglected.

Secretary George H. Wiley, chairman and managing director of the exposition, and his staff of assistants, are busy with the arrangements for both convention and exposition. The forty members of the Dayton local are members of eight different committees to whom have been entrusted the reception, registration and entertainment of delegates and visitors, special attention being given to arrangements for the entertainment of the wives, daughters and sweethearts of exhibitors. The Algonquin Hotel has been selected for convention headquarters and delegates will find it convenient to make reservations at that house. Other hotels will provide ample accommodations for all who wish to attend the meeting. The Greater Dayton Association has interested itself in the event and is giving the convention committee every possible assistance.

Regarding the exposition in particular, Managing Director Wiley says that the reservation of space in Memorial Hall enables him to predict a trade exhibit of the most interesting and diversified character. Every device and mechanical equipment, or accessory of the motion picture, will be represented on the exposition floor. Already much of the available space has been taken and the success of the exhibit is assured.

A magnificent program of the convention and exposition will be published. It will be a very beautiful publication and will be distributed free to all who attend the meeting. It is also planned to distribute copies to all members of the league prior to the convention. The program will not be sold, but given away. Mr. Charles S. Pholy, of the program committee, is in New York calling upon the trade at this point.

In the way of publicity a handsome poster has been designed and will be distributed presently. An illustrated pamphlet directing the attention of the exhibitor to the importance of the exposition and pointing out the salient features thereof has been mailed to every exhibitor in the United States and Canada, with a strong invitation to attend. This excellent promotion work together with the boosting that is being done by the several state branches of the league should insure a large attendance at the Dayton meeting.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITORS' CONVENTION.

It Will be Held at the Grand Central Palace, New York, During the Exposition.

The forthcoming exposition in New York City at the Grand Central Palace, June 8 to 13, will afford plenty of opportunities for the manufacturers to exchange views, as the annual convention of the International Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association and the independent exhibitors of America will be held in the convention hall of the Grand Central Palace.

This convention will be an open one, permitting the exhibitor to voice his views, to express his thoughts, thereby seeking a remedy to the many existing evils affecting this industry. Identification cards are being issued to all bona fide exhibitors applying to the secretary, Harold W. Rosenthal, 136 Third Avenue, New York City. This card will entitle the holder to all privileges during the exposition and convention.

One of the most important questions which will be taken up at this convention is the matter of state and local censorship. This association is strongly opposed to individual censorship.

That the exposition is going to be replete with many novel features is already shown by the large number of novelties which will be introduced by the many manufacturers and producers who have already contracted for space.

The committee selling floor space for the exposition at the Grand Central Palace, June 8 to 13, just closed a large contract with the All Star Feature Film Company, who are going to make an elaborate exhibit. New York Edison Company (electric lighting), a $1,200 space. An exteremely interesting exhibit this year will be the Automatic Ticket Seller and Cash Register, in booth 356. The Shubert Feature Film Company and Wm. A. Brady are going to exhibit at the big show.

Valuable prizes will be awarded to the most popular photoplay actor and actress. This voting contest will be an interesting feature. The public only will be permitted to cast votes, thereby insuring a fair test of the photoplayers popularity.

PREPARING FOR CALIFORNIA MEETING.

The executive board of the California state branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, met at the headquarters of the organization in the Phelan building, San Francisco, on April 2, and decided upon tentative plans for the third annual convention that is to be held at Sacramento this year. It was originally planned to hold this event in September, during State Fair Week, but at the recent meeting it was decided to hold it on the 6th, 7th and 8th of October. All the members of the board were present except M. W. Cory, who was absent on a business trip in Seattle, and W. H. Hilts, of San Diego. Plans are being made for a great gathering. It being estimated that no less than one hundred and twenty-five persons will make the trip from San Francisco and the bay cities. The local exhibitors plan to charter a boat and make the trip to the Capitol city by night, returning by train, the unusually low rate of $2 having been named for the round trip. A large attendance of ladies is expected, and the Sacramento exhibitors are making plans for entertainment on a large scale. It is hoped that some official of the national organization may be present as the meeting will be an important one, and the state organization enjoys the distinction of having been in existence before the formation of the larger body.

AN EAST SIDE BRANCH.

Exhibitors representing almost every motion picture theater on the East Side, held a mass meeting at Tishlers' Rivington Casino Theater on Monday morning, April 20, for the purpose of forming a branch organization to improve conditions of the moving picture business on the East Side.

After general discussion a temporary organization was formed, Wm. Brandt being elected temporary chairman, and Moses Silverman temporary secretary. In order to give every exhibitor a chance to be present to help organize, a special meeting will be called for Tuesday morning, April 28, eleven o'clock, at the same place. It is believed that the East Side will be the strongest branch in the city.

CONVENTIONS SCHEDULED.

May will be a busy month with the state exhibitors' leagues. Already a number of conventions have been scheduled and others are to be heard from. The Iowa convention, originally dated for May 12 and 13, has been set forward to May 28 and 29 to enable President Neff, of the National League, to attend.

There promises to be a big meeting of exhibitors of North and South Carolina at Charlotte, N. C., on May 18 to 20. This is the first meeting of exhibitors that has been held in the Southeast. President Neff, of the National League, is expected to attend this meeting.

The following convention dates have been reported:

New York State at Seneca Hotel, Rochester, May 5.
North and South Carolina at Charlotte, N. C. May 18 to 20.
Alabama at Birmingham.....May 21 and 22
Iowa at DesMoines.....May 28 and 29.
Nebraska at Grand Island.....June 2 and 3.
Michigan, Tuller Hotel, Detroit.....June 9 to 11.

MASSACHUSETTS TWENTY-MINUTE LAW.

The committee on mercantile affairs of the Massachusetts Legislature has made a favorable report on the bill of the American Federation of Labor which seeks to codify all laws relative to motion pictures in that state and carries with an amendment repealing the so-called twenty-minute law. While there is grounds for believing that the twenty-minute law will be repealed a hard fight is expected and all Massachusetts exhibitors are urged to lend their support to the men in charge of the fight.

NEW YORK STATE LEAGUE CONVENTION.

Exhibitors of New York state are reminded that the ennual convention of the New York State Exhibitors' League will be held on Tuesday, May 5, at the Hotel Seneca, Rochester, N. Y. After the convention a ball and reception will be given in the evening. Many prominent photoplayers will be present. There is a good time in store for all who attend.

GREENE BUYS MENDEL BEILIS TERRITORY.

Greene's Feature Photoplays, Inc., has secured the rights for New York, Northern New Jersey and New England, for the French-American Film Company's feature "The Mystery of the Mendel Beilis Case."

STRAND PROGRAM CHANGES.

The program at the Strand Theater, New York, will change on Sunday, April 26, when the Lasky feature, "Brewster's Millions," will become the principal subject.

U. S. S. NEW YORK ADDS POWER'S MACHINE TO BATTERY.

The super-dreadnought New York, which sailed Sunday night, April 26th, for Vera Cruz, has installed a Power's 6A Projector, and on the trip down the coast will show to the sailors and marines pictures demonstrating military and naval tactics. The subjects are the same that have been shown to the cadets and midshipmen at West Point and Annapolis.

SAWYER ANNOUNCES RELEASE.

A. H. Sawyer, Inc., who has taken permanent offices in the Mecca Building, 1600 Broadway, New York, announces that his first feature release will be "The Lightning Conductor," a melodramatic subject produced by William Elliott, with William Farnum in the principal role. It is a seven-part feature written for pictures by Walter Hale, from C. N. and A. M. Williamson's story of the same title.

The cast, consisting of Mr. Farnum, Mr. Elliott, Mr. Hale, Miss Helen Bertram, Miss Rosina Henley and others, left New York last summer, taking with them two large automobiles, and all accessories necessary to produce the picture. The action of the picture begins in London, where Molly Randolph, a wealthy American girl, decides to take a motor trip through Europe. She buys a second-hand car, which, she is assured by the owner, is as good as new. Beginning with a breakdown shortly after leaving London, troubles with a rascally chauffeur and complications with the police of the different countries passed through, furnish a series of incidents that have been clearly reproduced. A trip of over five thousand miles in automobiles was made in order to produce the different scenes in the exact locations recorded by the book. Some wonderful backgrounds are shown in the pictures, particularly scenes through the Alps, and those along Lake Como, in Italy. The production is in seven parts, and an invitation exhibition will be given at one of the leading theaters in about a week.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"AURORA OF THE NORTH" (Rex).

Lloyd Ingraham is the author of this play. It is a romance of the early days in the trackless forests of the great Canadian Northwest when fur traders were monarchs of their domain and upheld their self-imposed authority by force of arms. First, Mr. Ingraham has developed a vigorous plot with tense action; second, he has evolved a character that fits finely Robert Leonard's great physique, splendid personality and ability as an actor. Miss Hazel Buckham, playing opposite as Aurora, also has a role that allows much opportunity at disclosing her delicate attractiveness and emotional power.

Scene from "Aurora of the North" (Rex).

Mr. Ingraham is combined with Mr. Leonard in producing the piece. To secure the picturesque backgrounds they have taken their company into the mountains proper. Every detail has been carefully looked to with an eye of projecting a perfect atmosphere of "yesterday" up in the great woods of the North. It is a photoplay that is going to appeal to all, at least to all who have a taste for the best in "romance," gripping situations and finished character studies.

The story opens when a party of Indian trappers bring the news to the fur trader that a strange white man is hunting in their territory. Soon after the stranger, unaware that he is transgressing the traditional rights, is captured and brought to the post. Aurora, the trader's motherless daughter, has been raised to womanhood with the association of but few people other than Indians. We soon find the stranger and Aurora in love.

The story proper concerns Aurora's sacrifice, the saving of her lover from starvation in the woods when he is sent out without gun or knife by her father as punishment, and the final forgiveness of the father. An Indian, who secretly loves the girl, also plays an important part.

"THE JUNGLE" A POWERFUL FILM.

Upton Sinclair, novelist and dramatist, returned to New York from Bermuda this week to stay long enough to add a few touches and play his role in the coming production in moving pictures of his life's greatest work, "The Jungle," which is being produced by the All Star Feature Corporation, and which it is announced will be the next attraction to be offered by that company. A tremendously powerful company has been engaged for the production, and under the personal direction of Augustus Thomas, director general of the company, there has progressed the taking of many scenes of more than unusual dramatic intensity.

George Nash, formerly star of "The Gamblers" and of "Officer 666," and who is at the present time enjoying a most successful run in "Panthea" at the Booth Theater, is cast in the strong part of Jurgis, while opposite him is none other than Gail Kane, present star of "Seven Keys to Baldpate." Others of the company are Alice Marc, Robert Cummings, George Irving, W. Vermilyea and Julia R. Hurley. The attention to detail and vivid depiction of what the author means to convey in the big scenes in the stockyards and manufacturing plants bespeak success for the film version of "The Jungle," which will be the next release of the All Star company about May 25.

"HER FIGHTING CHANCE" (American).

A two-part society drama enacted with the usual "Flying A" efficiency, of excellent dramatic merit and photographic quality. Ed Coxen as Jim Corbin, the husband, sacrifices domestic happiness to his literary ambitions and the tie that binds is strained to the breaking point when Winifred Greenwood, as Nell Dare, enters the life of the novelist.

Scene from "Her Fighting Chance" (American).

The bond of sympathy matures into sincere admiration when fate permits the paths of the two women to cross each other. On the part of Nell the mental struggle that ensues results in an heroic sacrifice of selfish interest to the prior and legitimate claims of the wife. A portrayal of touching pathos tempered by realism and natural ease makes this subject stand out distinctively.

"MABEL AT THE WHEEL" (Keystone).

The Keystone release on April 18, "Mabel at the Wheel," a satire on the Grand Prix held at Santa Monica, Cal. March 26 brings out almost all the Keystone stars. Mabel Normand and Harry McCoy work in most of their comedy through the medium of racing automobiles. Mack Sennett sits up in the grand stand and does the country boob act while the inimitable Charles Chaplain plays a sort of a Desperate Desmond and is all over the place, puncturing tires, oiling the tracks, throwing bombs and doing everything imaginable. This will undoubtedly be the Keystone success of the year. Mabel Normand and Mack Sennett collaborated in the direction of this picture.

MELIES CHANGES RELEASE DATE.

The big five-part production of the Gaston Melies Company, entitled "The Curse of Greed," which has been advertised as scheduled for release on June 3, will not be released on that day. Exhibitors will be able to get the picture a few weeks earlier than that date and the proper release day is now May 19. The Melies advertisement in this issue also calls attention to the change. The subject is to be released through the General Film Company. Exhibitors will please note the change in release date.

FOUR NEW OFFICES OPENED BY WARNER'S.

H. M. Warner, the general sales manager of Warner's Features, Inc., announced the opening of four new exchanges or branch offices of the parent organization. They are as follows:

3 Reilly Building, Wheeling, W. Va., in charge of Edward A. Wheeler; Louisville, Ky., under the management of J. J. Herbert; 333 Oak Street, Portland, Oregon, with J. W. Dumont as manager, and 445 South Warren Street, Syracuse, N. Y.

Plans are also underway to establish a branch office in

A Group of the Live-Wires Representing Warner's Features.

Top, left to right: S. B. Kramer, Indianapolis; Sol. J. Berman, Kansas City; H. L. Hirsch, Chicago; J. L. Noecker, St. Louis. Bottom, left to right: Phil Soloman, Chicago; H. M. Warner, New York; W. L. Merrill, Minneapolis.

Charlotte, N. C. This will bring the total of the Warner exchanges up to twenty-seven, guaranteeing exhibitors in all parts of the United States and Canada a quick service of feature films.

Other recent changes in the personnel of Warner's field staff are the selection of J. S. Hebrew for manager of the Philadelphia office, succeeding G. D. Briggs, Jr., and the sending of M. L. Krieger to Los Angeles to replace Fred C. Dawes.

"THE GOD OF VENGEANCE" (Chariot).

This is a story of a collector of curios who gets possession of a sacred jewel taken from the shrine of an Indian god. The Indian god is an object of worship to a large sect of followers who look upon the despoilment of the treasures of their god as a sacrilege. A number of these fanatics have followed the curio collector to his home in England and two of them are selected by a secret council to recover the sacred jewel at all costs. They gain entrance into the Englishman's home by means of a forged letter and at once set about their self-imposed task to recover the missing jewel. This gives rice to a series of thrilling and interesting adventures. The English curio collector having received repeated warnings that he must surrender the sacred jewel or answer for it with his life, has carefully concealed the jewel in a secret drawer. The two Hindoos succeed in locating this secret drawer and are about to break it open and hasten away with the jewel when they are surprised by the daughter of the curio collector. The daughter has fallen in love with one of the Hindoos who exercises strange hypnotic powers over her. The entrance of the father breaks the hypnotic spell and the two Hindoos are pursued by the collector and his household. A long and desperate chase ensues in the course of which the chief Hindoo is seriously wounded. He has, however, obtained possession of the jewel and in a dying condition drags himself to the room where his co-religionists are gathered in secret conclave. He restores the jewel to the shrine of the god and then expires.

Photography, settings and acting in this feature are uniformly good and the action is logically worked out.

"THE INVENTOR'S WIFE" (Lubin).

Worthy men so immersed in arts and mechanics often permit their brains to be so intent in their labor that home and wife are entirely forgotten, such was the case with John Ward, a mechanic of a large electric corporation, who was working on an idea that would make millions for his employers and which made him a hopeless domestic wreck. A rival corporation succeeded in installing a female spy into Ward's workshop who, with the tact of the adventuress, not only acquired the inventor's secrets but by continual contact at work won Ward's thoughts from his esteemable wife. Sickness by nervous prostration took possession of the man and the spy became his companion. The wife's happiness was wrecked and misery invaded the home. But retribution came. The spy tampered with the invention and in so doing met her death by electricity. The secret was preserved and the happiness of the home restored. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe play the leading roles and give full value to the worthy script written by Shannon Fife, one of the most intense writers of the Lubin staff.

Scene from "The Inventor's Wife" (Lubin).

UNIVERSAL WAR SERVICE.

No modern war is complete now without its battery of moving picture cameras, and the present Mexican embroilio is no exception. In order to be in a position to give the world all the news of the fighting at first hand, the Universal, through its organized news service, the Universal Animated Weekly, has started two of its most expert cameramen post haste toward the seat of war.

The Universal pictures of the fighting, if there is any, will be taken with the full permission of the Navy Department, under certain restrictions. Mr. Jack Cohn, editor of the Animated Weekly, made a rush trip to Washington last Monday to see Secretary of the Navy Daniels, and obtain the permission of the Department to have a moving picture operator accompany the battleships. He was successful; the necessary orders were given, and wires were sent by Mr. Cohn from Washington to the Coast plant of the Universal to send Al Siegler from there to San Diego, where he would catch the Battleship South Dakota, which is on its way to Panama, and to Charles Rucker, in New York, to catch the Nersus at Hampton Roads Wednesday.

In this way the Universal will have a man on the Atlantic side and one on the Pacific as well, and should be able to secure some wonderful pictures. No reel will be released to the public until it has been first submitted and passed by the Navy Department, which will also receive a print of every reel for its own use.

GENERAL FILM RELEASING BIG SUBJECTS.

At the time of the opening of the Vitagraph Theater, New York, it was not determined as to whether the Vitagraph five-reel production, "A Million Bid," was to be released through the General Film Company or direct on the state rights plan, therefore no mention could be made of the channels through which it was to be released in the review of this picture, which review appeared in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD of February 7th of this year.

It is now definitely decided that "A Million Bid" will be released through the General Film Company by its Feature Departments. A synopsis of this picture is given in April 11th issue of this paper. The picture will be released during the week of April 26th. During the same week the General Film Company, through its special Feature Department, will release two other big productions, namely, "The Militant Suffragette," a five-reel Pathé production, and "The Swamp Fox" in three, by the Kalem Company. The synopses of these two releases are given elsewhere in this issue. An extended review of "The Militant Suffragette" appeared on page 494 of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD of April 25th and a review of "The Swamp Fox" appears on page 646 of this issue.

Scene from "A Million Bid" (Vitagraph).

"THE MYSTERY OF ROOM 643" (Essanay).

"In the Moon's Ray," released April 10th, is shown the first adventure of Richard Neal, private investigator of crime. "The Mystery of Room 643" is the second adventure. Francis X. Bushman portrays the character of Neal, the famous detective, and plays the part smoothly. There is an atmosphere of mystery throughout the entire two thousand feet that will hold the interest of the observer. Some valuable papers have been stolen from a safe. Neal is sent for to solve the mystery. This production is one of the best the Essanay Company has released this year. There is not a dull moment or a hitch from the main title to the Indian head trade mark. One of the features of the story is the fight in the villain's den. This is thrilling in the extreme. A love story runs through the piece, which makes it very interesting. The photography is superb. This production is booked for release Friday, May 8th.

APPERTAININ' TO "THE MASTER MIND."

"The Master Mind," the third release of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, is now complete and the negative in its finished state is enroute East in the custody of Edmund Breese, the brilliant dramatic actor, who again appeared in the role of Richard Allen, the master mind, a part in which he appeared two hundred times on the acting stage.

A letter from Oscar Apfel to Mr. Goldfish, executive head of the Lasky company, says "The Master Mind" contains numerous surprises and that its many novel features will give this unusually interesting picture an added attractiveness.

Where, as in the stage production of "The Master Mind," the action of the piece began with Henry and Richard Allen full grown men and hardened crooks, the film version will begin with the two Allen boys, as children. One is kidnaped by a traveling gypsy band and grows up a crook. The elder then goes to New York and by slow degrees becomes head of a gang of bad-men.

Virile to a degree, with a most absorbing topic and headed by Edmund Breese there is every reason to look forward to the third Lasky release with anticipatory pleasure.

RITA SACCHETTO IN A MILITARY DRAMA.

The East India Feature Film Company offer state rights for its four-reel feature production, "In the Line of Duty," a drama of military life in India, featuring the famous emotional actress, Rita Sacchetto, in which production this distinguished Italian artist scores a distinct triumph and demonstrates her versatility as an emotional actress, classical dancer and pantomimist. "In the Line of Duty" is a tense, overpowering drama that just escapes tragedy by a happy twist. It teems with thrilling and unexpected situations, that culminate in a climax of more than ordinary strength. With the interest in military drama that has resulted from the conflict between the United States and Mexico, this feature possesses a timely as well as a general value.

"THE TOREADOR'S ROMANCE" (Kleine-Cines).

Many of the scenes of George Kleine's new two-reel feature subject, "The Toreador's Romance," are laid in picturesque sections of sunny Spain seldom visited by the tourist, yet equal in natural beauty and historical interest to any ever shown upon the motion picture screen. The earlier scenes take place among the "ranchos" of Andalusia; later the action of the story takes us to beautiful Seville, and finally we find ourselves in the great arena of that city, watching the most famous toreadors of Spain display their prowess in the national pastime.

All the scenic beauty and educational interest of this special film, however, are only incidental to a strong plot worked out with all the cleverness so characteristic of the best of European directors. This is a story of love and sacrifice, full of exciting incident, teeming with sensational scenes and tinctured with the romantic spirit of old Castile. How Jose, a herder on a Spanish "rancho," is saved from prison by a wealthy manufacturer, how he becomes a famous toreador and the idol of the Spanish populace, finally sacrificing his life in the arena for the happiness of his benefactor, is splendidly portrayed. This is a "Cines" subject and is scheduled for release through the General Film Company Tuesday, May 12.

KENTUCKY.

THE Louisville Evening Post is one of the many papers of the country which is to run the serial story "Lucille Love," which the Universal Film Manufacturing Company has just released. It has not been decided definitely, but it is probable that the Novelty Theater will be the first to run it in Louisville. Louisville packed the theaters to see the releases on "Zigomar," and it has been proved that multiple-reel pictures create a world of interest locally.

The Westonian Airdome, Louisville, will open on May 20 for a season's run, according to the latest reports. This will be the third season for the Westonian, but the policy of the house will be slightly changed this season, and high-class feature performances will be exhibited.

Manager H. A. Bilger, of the Hopkins Theater, Louisville, has announced his intention of operating the house through the whole of the summer. It has been customary to darken the house as soon as the park season opened, as Mr. Bilger is also manager of the Fontaine Ferry Amusement Company, and is forced to give a good deal of his attention to the handling of the park. It has been such a good season with the Hopkins, however, that it has been decided to keep the ball rolling all summer. One reason for this is the fact that it always takes a few weeks to get a crowd back in the habit of coming to a show house after it has been closed for several months. The prices will remain the same, ten cents for the first floor and five cents for the upper floors.

Walter H. Anderson, manager of the Louisville branch of the Miller Feature Film Company, New Harmony, Ind., recently returned from a trip to Lebanon, Middlesboro, and Corbin, Ky., which are located in the mountain district of Kentucky, near the Tennessee line. His cousin, W. L. Anderson, who is with him, has returned from a trip to Elizabethtown and Southwestern Kentucky. The two Andersons work Kentucky and Indiana with eight feature films, which they have the leases on. One of the latest films upon which the company has taken lease is the Emmaline Pankhurst feature, showing "what eighty million women want."

Joseph Goldberg, manager of the New Grand, on Portland avenue, Louisville, reports business as having been very light during the whole of Lent, but that very good crowds have attended the Sunday performances. His assistant, Clarence Curry, better known as "Pickles," is a wonder. Manager Goldberg said that the boy is a regular horse for work—he is always ready to help every one, but still manages to keep his own work up. The boy is only about eighteen years of age, but, according to Mr. Goldberg, he is a comer.

R. S. Shrader, manager of the Central Film Company, Louisville, has returned from a trip to the company's main office in Indianapolis.

Jack Johnston, of the firm of Carpenter & Johnston, Louisville cameramen, has given up his position with the Novelty Theater. Mr. Johnston worked at the Novelty as an operator with his partner, Carpenter, during the dull season. His eyesight has gone back on him, and for the next two weeks he will take life easy at West Baden Springs, Ind. After the vacation he expects to give his whole attention to the taking of moving pictures for commercial purposes.

Solomon & Taylor, Hodgenville, have opened a new moving picture theater. A new Power's 6-A machine was installed. Harry Abney, who for a number of months has been an assistant at the Novelty, Louisville, will be in the operating booth. Abney is considered to be one of the best operators in Louisville, and is a good electrician, but was barred from the operators' union of Louisville because he was not of age. He is only nineteen years old, and could work only as an assistant, but is thoroughly competent.

J. S. Bingham, of the Empress Feature Film Company, Indianapolis, Ind., was recently in Louisville looking for bookings for some of the company's latest releases.

The South Louisville Amusement Company was recently incorporated with a capital stock of $1,000, divided into shares of $10 each. Joseph L. Lenihan holds fifty shares, Ralph Ciabattaci, 49, and A. P. Norheimer, 1. The debt limit is placed at $1,000.

Louis J. Dittmar and Judge Allen Kinney have taken a lease on a building on Fourth avenue, near Jefferson street, and will put in a new picture show which will have a seating capacity of five hundred. The Columbia Theater is on the same block, but on the other side of the street. The lease on the old theater expires on July 1, and the Princess Amusement Company will turn it loose, according to President Allen Kinney.

A building permit has been granted to the Rio Realty Company to build a motion picture house at 2817 Dumesnil avenue, which is in Parkland. The structure will be two stories in height and of brick construction. It is estimated that the house will cost about $7,500. M. H. Thatcher, former governor of the Canal Zone, is president of the Rio Realty Company, and J. Frank Taylor, formerly surveyor of the port in this district, is secretary. The new theater will be called the Parkland.

Ashland is to have a new picture house on which work is well under way. The theater will be on Winchester avenue, and will be called the Scenic. A. P. Barnard, president of the Kinemacolor Company of America, with headquarters in New York, is in Louisville on a visit. Louisville is Mr. Barnard's home. He has been visiting his father, Captain L. P. Barnard, head of the Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Company. Mr. Barnard was formerly a prominent figure in Louisville tobacco circles as well as in those of the State, and at one time was chairman of the board of trustees of the New Albany lodge of Elks. A dinner was recently given for him by some of his intimate friends, at the Seelbach Hotel.

The Lion Operahouse Company has been incorporated at Glasgow, Ky., with a capital stock of $10,000. The incorporators are Amess K. Maluf, Phoebe N. Maluf and T. P. Dickinson.

J. J. Johnston, of the firm of Carpenter & Johnston, Louisville cameramen, returned from a short trip to French Lick Springs, Ind., but will go back in a few days. He has been considerably under the weather for the past month, and needs a long rest.

Carpenter & Johnston recently made a picture of a negro baptism, which was held on the Louisville water front. Easter Sunday was the day chosen for the baptising, and about seventy-five negroes were present who expected to go under the water. The water was anything but warm, and the temperature was not very high. The consequence was that a lot of the dusky breathren declined the issue, after seeing some of the baptized ones come out with chattering teeth. The pictures have been forwarded to the Selig Hearst News Pictorial. The real Southern negro is hard to beat for comedy, and the pictures should make a big hit.

The Walnut Theater, of Louisville, has secured the big feature, "Lucile Love," a Universal multiple-reel serial production, and will show the first installment soon. The Louisville Evening Post is putting out 100,000 special editions which give the story of the pictures, and are scattering them from house to house in Louisville, New Albany, Ind., and Jefferson, Ind. The Central Film Company secured the contract for the pictures. The pictures will be shown in weekly installments of two reels for fifteen weeks.

Business with Louisville exhibitors has started to pick up since the wind-up of the Lenten season, and from now on it should be as good or better than it was at the corresponding season of last year. There is considerable talk of a new theater to go up on Fourth avenue, between Walnut and Green streets, but nothing definite has been learned regarding the reports.

Ralph A. Studyvin, special representative of the Central Film Service Company, Indianapolis, Ind., was recently in Louisville, calling on Manager R. S. Shrader, of the Central's Louisville branch.

The six-reel Universal production of "Samson" will be shown at the Walnut Theater, starting May 10. Warren Kerrigan takes the principal part in the production, and as he is a topheavy favorite in Louisville, the feature should make a big success. Kerrigan was formerly of New Albany, Ind., which is directly across the river from Louisville.

The Owl Feature Film Company, Louisville, is getting out circular letters to its trade, in which it is making a special play on the feature, "Ten Nights in a Barroom." Kentucky is well worked up at present over the whisky situation and the feature should meet with marked success. At a recent meeting of the General Assembly the State came very near being voted dry, and prohibition is a matter that the smaller towns are particularly interested in.

Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays are the days on which pictures are shown. Admission prices are five and ten cents. Managers Prower and Bottom are very well pleased with conditions so far.

A trip was made around Louisville to the principal points of interest, and an informal reception was held at the rooms of the Louisville Board of Trade. Mr. Cox took moving pictures of the festivities and the auto trip. The pictures will be shown later at a meeting of the Chicago business for the edification of those who were not able to make the trip.

The Lyric Theater, Henderson, Ky., has been leased by Stonewall Watson and R. P. McClanahan. The latter will be in active charge of the theater, which will be operated as a straight five-cent house.

The Nickelodeon Theater, Henderson, Ky., has opened and is showing some very good pictures. The first picture exhibited was the five-reel Famous Players, "A Lady of Quality," in which Cecilia Loftus takes the principal part. Coupon tickets are given away with each purchased ticket, and a prize drawing is held each Friday night. The prize is one share of stock of the company, which is valued at $10, and which is redeemable at the end of ninety days at the Henderson County Savings Bank.

The Breeze Amusement Company, Fleming, Ky., has placed an order for a modern individual electric lighting plant to be used in operating the Princess Theater. The dynamo will be driven by a gasoline engine, which will be installed shortly.

The Park Theater, Henderson, Ky., has been sold by Podley & Burch, of Owensboro, Ky., to H. L. Hunt, of Jacksonville, Ill. Mr. Hunt recently retired from the management of the Grand Opera House and Hotel, at Jacksonville, and has had considerable experience along the line. He expects to run vaudeville and motion pictures at the Park.

The Enterprise Amusement Company, Campbellsville, Ky., which operates the Opera House, is showing five reels of pictures, the admission fee being five cents. The company is doing some co-operative advertising with some of the largest concerns in Campbellsville, and recently took a part of a full-page advertisement with W. M. Wilson, the leading vehicle dealer.

It is generally understood that Louisville will be in the circuit which the Shuberts of New York are said to be figuring on. Jules Murray recently announced that the company expected to open about 1,000 houses in the United States, and would cover practically the whole country. It is also understood that the Shubert Film Producing Company will be subsidiary to the Shubert Film Booking Company.

Fisher Brothers & Company, Lawrenceburg, Ky., have completed the new motion picture theater which has been in course of construction for some time, and have started giving daily shows. The two Fisher brothers, James and Carroll, recently made a trip to Cincinnati to procure the motion picture machine, chairs and piano.

The fight between the Cherokee Amusement Company, of Louisville, and the property holders in the neighborhood of the proposed new theater has not been quite settled yet. The property holders were under the impression that the theater was to be used for vaudeville and cabaret performances, and it seems that it is impossible to get the idea out of their heads. The proprietors had no intention at any time of operating anything but a straight motion picture house.

J. C. Benson, of the Blache Feature Film Company, Indianapolis, Ind., was a recent visitor to Louisville.

As this city was formerly the great importing center for the opium trade with a Chinatown filled with smoking dens, the picture will be of more than ordinary interest.

The Tivoli, conducted by the Turner & Dahnken Circuit, will show the World Feature Film Corporation's film, "Prodca," during the week of April 26.

The Savoy Theater, in McAllister street, is now being conducted by W. A. MacKenzie, who plans to show travel and educational films exclusive at a uniform admission price of 25 cents. This theater is fitted up in typical Oriental style, and a number of improvements are now being made to the decorative scheme, making it a unique house. The Savoy Theater was conducted for a time by E. Fleet Bostwick, who has mysteriously disappeared. It is being reopened with a two weeks' run on the Carnegie Museum new Arctic Hunt pictures taken by Captain W. E. Kleinschmidt during 1913, the lecture accompanying the pictures being delivered by the cameraman, S. A. Powell. Following this the Balkan War pictures will be shown for a week, these to be succeeded by a very interesting educational film, "The Boy and the Law."

C. B. Price has been appointed district manager of the interests of the World Feature Film Corporation in the territory west of Denver and is now in San Francisco on his initial trip of inspection. E. H. Duffy, special representative of this firm, is still on the Coast, but will leave shortly for Chicago, where he will make his headquarters, having been appointed district manager for the territory of which that city is the center.

J. E. Watson has been granted a permit for the showing of moving pictures at 1355 Tenth avenue.

Willis Brown, well known as a jurist and the founder of a Boy's City, was in San Francisco this week. He is the author of the scenario from which the film, "Boy and the Law," was made.

The Eclectic Film Company has made a great success of the release of its film, "The Perils of Pauline," as far as San Francisco is concerned, and much interest is being taken in the production. Fourteen copies were released here on the opening date, which was a week later than in other territories. The second release will be dated one week from the first, and after that the films will be put out every two weeks. Manager Frank L. Hudson, of the San Francisco office, is flooded with orders and inquiries from outside points, indicating that the publicity campaign has been an unqualified success. The "Perils of Pauline" was to be seen on the opening date at the following San Francisco houses: the Edison Theater, the New Theater, the Jose Theater, the Majestic Theater, the All Star Theater, the Garrick Theater, the Liberty Theater, the Silver Palace, the Panama, the Premium Theater and the Washington Square Theater.

President C. W. Goddard, of the California State Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, and J. Ray Williams, president of Sacramento Valley Local No. 3, visited exhibitors in Stockton this week to form a local there.

W. Traggardh, secretary-treasurer of the Union Film & Supply Co., is planning to make a visit to Los Angeles shortly, and from there will probably go to New York. This firm is in the process of reorganization, president and general manager E. H. Emmick having recently withdrawn to affiliate himself with the Golden Gate Film Exchange.

At Saint John's Church, Oakland, colored motion pictures were shown during the evening services on Palm Sunday.

The Wonderland Theater, at Turlock, is being enlarged, and when the improvements are complete the seating capacity will be over five hundred.

The Empress Theater, at Sacramento, is securing considerable publicity through a controversy with labor unions there. The Federated Trades Council is running a notice in the daily papers to the effect that the house is unfair, while the theater management denies this in a similar advertisement. The new policy of showing pictures in the morning and in the afternoon between the vaudeville shows is proving a success.

Mrs. C. B. Gray has awarded a contract for the erection of a reinforced concrete theater building at Martinez, which is to be occupied when completed by the Novelty Theater.

It is reported that a moving picture theater, to cost $75,000, is to be erected on the George W. Gates property at Burlingame. The house is to have a seating capacity of about 1,000.

The Grand Theater, Sacramento, has opened with the Bert Levey circuit of vaudeville. Three reels of moving pictures are on each program.

Mayor Charles Heywood, of Berkeley, dealt a broadside to baseball and moving pictures recently in a talk at a revival meeting. He advocated setting aside Saturday as a business holiday, so that persons could have the amusement they craved and would have no sports or entertainments allowed on Sunday.

CHURCH.

MISSOURI.

BALMY weather in Kansas City has proved beneficial to exhibitors. The streets have been filled at all hours, while the same statement applies to motion picture houses. Recent productions have been as favorable as weather conditions and probably have had more to do with the fine attendance.

The Star Feature Film Service is the newest arrival in Kansas City, where it has established offices in the Gloyd building. The new exchange is under the management of B. Barnett, who has operated the Star Feature Film Service at Minneapolis, Kan., for seven past. The Minneapolis exchange has been turned over to B. Barnett, Jr., a son. The elder Mr. Barnett will give his personal attention to the Kansas City service, which controls the Jesse L. Lasky productions for Missouri, Kansas, Iowa and Nebraska.

Malcolm MacKay, Kansas and Oklahoma lessor of "Les Miserables," has returned to Kansas City after a successful tour through Oklahoma. Sixteen thousand people saw the feature in Oklahoma City, and 6,000 at Tulsa, according to Mr. MacKay. The feature will be shown in Kansas in the immediate future.

The Hammond Theater, one of the tent shows prohibited by an ordinance recently introduced in the Kansas City council, has opened for business at Twelfth street and Virginia avenue, Kansas City. C. Rosenberg is the proprietor. Mr. Rosenberg plans to give patrons high-grade features at an admission price of five cents. The ordinance which will put him out of business if passed is pending in the council and probably will come up for action in the near future, with the spring election out of the way.

J. E. Ratekin, treasurer of the Grand Theater Company, which stages "gob" plays chiefly, has edged in on the moving picture business. Mr. Ratekin will manage the Gladstone Theater, at 4608 St. John street, which is now owned by J. G. Hiatt. E. P. Churchill, the old owner, has retired.

The Missouri rights for the All Star features have been secured by the Kansas City Feature Film Company. They had been held by a St. Louis exchange for some time past.

After several years as an exhibitor, Herbert Thatcher has joined the Universal, and will do road work in Kansas. He formerly was in business at Salina.

The World's Leader Feature Film Company's Kansas City branch, heretofore conducted by Julius Singer, has been taken over by M. C. Nolan and L. M. Bacon, who will conduct the exchange as an independent one. Mr. Singer has left for the East. He recently engaged in a dispute with the local authorities as to the merits and demerits of "Shadows of Sin," a feature, and shortly after decided to abandon Kansas City as a place of business. The new owners have added the Ramo features to those handled. Mr. Nolan is best known as a wealthy lumber manufacturer, but is willing to spend some money in the moving picture industry, if necessary. Mr. Bacon has had active experience in the exchange business. The quarters in the Gloyd building will be retained.

Mirror screens are highly popular in Kansas City, but Frank L. Newman, promoter of the new Royal Theater in Main street, has found a drawback to them. A $1,000 screen for the Royal, which will be opened on May 10, recently arrived in Kansas City, and Mr. Newman decided to store it until the house was ready to receive it. His plans went awry, however, when the transfer companies refused to take a chance on moving it, unless all liability was waived by the owner. Mr. Newman decided to let the mirror screen rest in the freight depots for a time.

An unusual advertising plan has been put into commission by the Standard Amusement Company, of Kansas City, which controls four popular theaters. Double space has been taken in a number of street cars to advertise the coming programs at the various motion picture houses operated by the company. The cards are to be changed weekly. The announcement of the coming attractions at all of the four theaters will continue to be flashed on the screen, as in the past. Whether the added publicity is worth the price paid is a mooted point in moving picture circles. Officers of the Standard, however, view the experiment with favor after a short trial and probably will continue it.

Dustin Farnum, in the "Squaw Man," was a notable attraction at the Tenth Street Theater recently. The four-reel feature brought patrons from all sections of the city. The impressive thing was the manner in which the producers retained all of the heart interest, which has not been so successfully handled in all such reproductions.

A new house to seat about 300 persons is under course of construction at Savannah, Mo. Fred Hartley, owner of the new motion picture house, has not yet selected the name.

T. K. Fredorovicz is the owner of a new photo theater which recently opened at Hays, Kan., with a seating capacity of 350.

The Royal Amusement Company, which recently was formed at St. Joseph, Mo., by the consolidation of the Royal and Orpheum theaters, promises to become a power in moving picture circles of the West. Barney Reilly, who formerly managed the Royal in St. Joseph, is general manager of the company. Mr. Reilly, on a recent visit to Kansas City, announced that the Royal has secured exclusive rights for the Famous Player productions, All Star features, and the Jesse L. Lasky offerings in St. Joseph. The Royal Amusement Company has completed and opened the Royal Theater at Sioux City, Ia., and has broken ground on the new Orpheum Theater at Atchison, Kan.

Close watch on Western moving picture theaters which are introducing vaudeville or other similar attractions, and "legitimate" theaters which are transferring their allegiance to motion pictures, shows a decided majority in favor of the silent drama. Two houses which recently decided that moving pictures are the most potent attractions are the Knoxville, Ia., Opera House, under the management of Clarence Smith, and the King Opera House, at Albia, Ia., under the supervision of Elbert Payton.

Frank L. Talbot, who has met with conspicuous success in the vaudeville business, will make his debut as an exhibitor in the not distant future, according to a recent announcement. Mr. Talbot, who rather likes the jingle of gold coins, has watched the progress of animated pictures in Kansas City with mingled smiles and tears. He asserted recently that a lease on a site in Kansas City has been secured, and that a $150,000 motion picture theater will be erected. Mr. Talbot will continue to operate the Hippodrome in Kansas City.

INDIANA.

"THRILLER" films are to be introduced at the Irving, Indianapolis classical suburban picture house according to announcement just made. The management now seems to be convinced that the "highbrow" films are not for his house.

Charles Shaw says he will show Greenfield, Ind., to be a first class town. To this end he announces he will build an airdome there this summer.

Fire originating in a Wabash Avenue block in Terre Haute spread to the Fountain Theater, one of the leading and most popular of the local moving picture houses, and damaged the place $600 worth. This house recently changed hands.

The Hippodrome Amusement Company, of Terre Haute, Ind., has incorporated to operate a string of theaters. Capital stock is $100,000. Moving pictures will be a feature of the new houses. The incorporators, who are old hands in the picture and theatrical world, are T. W. Barhydt, M. Heiman, J. M. Finn.

Manager Mack, of the Peerless Film Company, is back again as manager of the World Special Films Corporation, Indianapolis. Mr. Mack formerly was with this last concern, but changed over to the Peerless recently. "The Triumph of an Emperor," a four reel World Special Films Corporation subject just put on at the Grand Central picture house here, is causing much talk. Mr. Mack watched at the door of the theater on one of the nights that the picture was shown and was personally congratulated by a score of patrons. The manager is noting good business with this film throughout Indiana and Western Kentucky.

"The Master Criminal," a four-reel film being placed by the World Special Films Corporation, is going strong. This film is being advertised in this part of the country with hand-colored photographs of exceptional merit.

E. Parker, former jailer and Gamewell police operator in Indianapolis, is managing the Peerless Film Company's exchange here.

During the Easter program moving picture houses throughout the State of Indiana advertised extensively in the newspapers, many carrying two and three column photographs of the leading favorite picture actors and actresses.

One paper in Brazil, Ind., is educating its readers along moving picture lines with two and three column articles describing the perils encountered by an English moving picture company in obtaining pictures "above the clouds."

The Mutual Film Corporation, Indianapolis, will occupy the rooms above the new Keystone Theater when completed.

Moving pictures played a prominent part in a Democratic meeting in Indianapolis the other night. The motion pictures were introduced as cigars were passed around. One of the films used was that portraying Lady Godiva and her sensational ride through the streets of Coventry.

The Muncie, Ind., school board has decided to use moving pictures in the recitation rooms for history teaching. The board thinks the pictures will not only facilitate education, but will detract pupils from the attention given to note writing and love-making while in the classrooms.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE Washington Exhibitors' and Exchangemen's Social Club has just been organized here with a charter membership of forty and with the probability of having more than one hundred names on the roster before the month is out. This club has been formed for purely social purposes, all matters of a business nature being left to the Exhibitors' League, and it is proposed to hold meetings monthly with a view to bringing together more closely the various men interested in the moving picture business. "Fraternity" will be the watchword of the infant association, and the first meeting will take the form of a "Dutch Lunch and Blowout" the latter part of May. Just what this "blowout" business is, no one will say, so the inquisitive ones will have to be on the job to find out. However, inasmuch as A. Dresner is president; Maurice Davis, vice-president; Joe Morgan, treasurer; and Harry Crandall is secretary, little more need be said. It is planned that this club will be of a type similar to the Screen Club of New York.

A persistent rumor to the effect that A. Dresner was about to sever his connections with the Washington Film Exchange was put to rest by that gentleman when he told the World representative that this rumor had no more foundation than that which would lead the public to believe that the exchange was to be discontinued. The business of the exchange has so grown that it was recently found necessary to open a branch exchange in Richmond, Va.

The Electric Theater Supply Company recently opened offices on the second floor of the Bank of Commerce Building, at Seventh and E streets, Northwest, where a number of offices have been engaged, and Mr. Daniel M. O'Brien has been installed as manager. The features of some eight different manufacturers will be here distributed, including the All Star and the Playgoers. The former was shown here for the first time during the week of April 26, when Tom Moore at the Garden Theater ran "The Great Diamond Robbery" for that week. The All Star features are already known here and the productions are being shown at a number of the houses. This exchange will cover Maryland, Virginia and North and South Carolina as well as the District of Columbia.

Mr. E. L. DeCosta, formerly with the Greater New York Film Exchange in charge of the Washington office, has severed his connection with that concern and has gone with Warner's Features, with his headquarters at Philadelphia. Mr. Getzler, the district manager, with territory south of New York, has taken over this office and will give it his personal attention.

Tom Moore, proprietor of a chain of moving picture houses in this city, is about to enlarge his Plaza Theater on Ninth street and will take in the adjoining building. The consolidation of the two properties will give him nearly twice his present floor space, and the alterations that will be made will give him one of the most attractive theaters along the street.

Some of the moving picture exhibitors and exchange men in the District of Columbia are greatly in favor of the enactment of such legislation as will cause the creation of a national censorship board by the Federal government. Some little complaint is heard along Ninth street because of the local censorship which seems to be personified by one police officer who, seeing a film which does not meet his approval, will cause the offending production to be withdrawn. One of the interested parties said it would appear that this man's duty was that of a patrolman, but that if he should witness all shows on Ninth street along where first runs are shown, it would require that he be on a duty other than that of a policeman for more than ten hours per day. If there were a national board of censorship a reel having their approval could be shown in any city in the country. At present a reel that will be passed as O. K. in New York or Chicago may be thrown out here and vice versa, for practically the same condition is universal. Of course, an appeal can always be taken, but no matter what the decision may be, it is always against the exhibitor, for the reel would not be put.

S. J. Mayer is again welcoming his friends and patrons of the General Film Company's local exchange for he has returned as its manager. Mr. Mayer left Washington some six months ago to open the Brooklyn exchange for the General Film Company and during a part of the intervening period has been acting as traveling auditor for the Mutual Film Exchange in the middle western territory. His return to Washington is a matter of no little satisfaction to local exhibitors for he is well known and universally liked.

The Southern Amusement Company has opened a moving picture theater at Greensboro, N. C., where a Power's 6A has been installed. This corporation also controls the Bijou Theater in Danville, Va., and both houses will be under the management of George F. Pryor, of the latter city. The name of the house is the Bijou.

C. W. Sawin, formerly manager of the local exchange of the General FEm Company, has gone to Atlanta, Ga., where he will join the Famous Players forces.

Ira J. Lamotte, manager of the Hippodrome, played host to 125 children from the Washington City Orphan Asylum, when on Thursday afternoon the doors of his theater were thrown open to the youngsters and a special program put on for their entertainment. The youngsters were brought from their home to the theater in automobiles furnished by the Cook & Stoddard Company and were taken back in the same vehicles after the entertainment was over.

M. D. Rosenberg, secretary-treasurer of the Colonial Amusement Company, has issued a call for a meeting of the stockholders of that company to be held at 4 o'clock, p.m., May 16, at the office of the corporation, at 927 Pennsylvania avenue, Northwest, for the purpose of electing officers for the ensuing year and the transacting such business as may come before the meeting.

Moving pictures of the Greek pageant-drama, "The Fire Regained," were shown here recently, but, according to the producers, these are somewhat unsatisfactory and a new set of reels are to be made when the drama is given here early in May. Some 1,500 young people will take part in the production. They are being recruited from the various dramatic and social organizations and will include many of those prominent in local society.

Congressman Frank B. Willis, of Ohio, has announced that he is preparing a measure looking toward the protection of motion picture manuscripts by copyright. The bill will be introduced into Congress within the next few weeks and action forced thereon.

Samuel Greenberg, of the Empire and Stanton Park Theaters, was recently awarded damages in the amount of $500 in a suit brought by him against the American Amusement Company, by whom he was formerly employed as manager.

The Gem Theater Company, of 1131 Seventh street, Northwest, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $3,300, divided into thirty-three shares of $100 each. The incorporators and trustees for the first year are Herman H. Hable, Fred Mayer and Fred H. Hable.

PHILADELPHIA.

THE popularity of moving pictures makes no distinction in classes of people. For the exclusive entertainment of the wives and the daughters of members of the Union League, a special performance of David Copperfield, by which Charles Dickens is best known, was given at the League recently through the courtesy of George W. Elkins.

Preparations are under way for the erection of a one-story brick moving picture house at 31st and Wharton streets, by the Star Amusement Company. The cost of construction is judged to be about $5,000.

A charter was granted to the American Cinema Film Company, of Philadelphia, under the laws provided by the State of Delaware. The corporation is capitalized at $50,000. E. R. Hansell, of Philadelphia, is the principal incorporator.

Final arrangements have been made by Samuel F. Wheeler to take over his new moving picture palace, recently purchased by him from the Berman Brothers, at 52nd and Thompson streets. Mr. Wheelers new enterprise will be named the "Appollo." This is one of the largest moving picture houses in this vicinity, and the price paid is close to $100,000. This is one of three largest houses in that district that is controlled by Mr. Wheeler.

Dr. Ross V. Patterson, of the Jefferson Medical College, set aside and denounced as without foundation the report that moving picture film contributes to an alarming degree to the spread of St. Vitus dance among the school children. "It cannot see," said he, "why any child should get St. Vitus dance by frequenting the 'movies!' There is no reason for it. The theory that they acquire the disease at such places is hectic and without foundation." This statement by a noted specialist along these lines will no doubt allay the sentiment that is arising among the mothers of this vicinity against their children attending moving picture shows.

Considerable interest is being manifested among the exhibitors of Reading, Pa., in the proposal for all houses to run ten-cent shows. By this means it is expected to generally elevate the moving picture theater business in and about that city to a higher plane. Already many of the proprietors of picture theaters located on the outskirts of the city have established a ten-cent admission for special feature plays and thus far report favorably on this proposition.

Plans have been completed for a theater to be built at the southeast corner of Sixty-first and Vine streets, for Herman Beyer & Company. It will be 4 feet 6 inches by 110 feet and the total cost will be about $5,500.

Regulations for the conduct of moving picture theaters in Pennsylvania will be the sole subject of discussion at a meeting to be held by the new State Industrial Board at Harrisburg some time in the near future. At this meeting the board, which has been making a study of the conditions, will submit a draft of rules to Commissioner John Price Jackson, who is chairman of the board, as to just how the moving picture houses should be regulated.

The construction of a moving picture house at Germantown avenue and Sharpnack streets for Benjamin Haas is being rushed to completion and it is thought that in the course of a few weeks, the picture house will be able to be occupied. The building is to be a one story brick, 45 by 84 feet.

A transaction was closed recently for the sale of about a half million dollars' worth of theater properties in various parts of the city. The properties in question are the Plaza, in Broad between Porter and Ritner streets; the Century, Marshall street and Erie avenue; the Parke, Thirty-third street and Ridge avenue; and the Imperial, Sixtieth and Walnut streets, assessed for a total of $280,000. The purchaser was the syndicate which controls the Stanley Amusement Company, and the price as announced by the brokers was close to $500,000.

Plans have been submitted to Jacob Kettenring of a moving picture house that will be built by him in Lancaster avenue, Ardmore, Pa. The picture house will be an up-to-date one-story building, and no doubt will be a success, as this is a much needed project in this section of the city.

The large populace of Bethlehem, Pa., soon will be able to see itself in action in the motion picture. Arthur Butler, of the National Film Company, received permission from Mayor Mitchell Walter, M. D., to photograph the city in action. The fire department and schools will be done in two reels. The work of taking the pictures will begin just as soon as complete arrangements are made.

An interesting and educational show was given by the Boot and Shoemakers' Association of Philadelphia in Musical Fund Hall, on April 15th. The chief attraction of the evening was a reel of moving pictures showing the processes in the manufacture of footwear of all descriptions. About seven hundred members of the association attended the show, and all were highly pleased with the exhibition.

Preliminary plans have been completed for the erection of a moving picture house for Levick & Walden, at 2709 North 5th street. The building will be a one-story brick and will have a seating capacity of five hundred. Work will begin immediately on the construction of the property and will be rushed to completion.

The Photoplay, a moving picture theater with a seating capacity of 1,200, at 221 Market street, Harrisburg, Pa., has been taken over by the Silverman brothers. The property formerly was owned by the Einstein Amusement Company. The Silvermans are members of a syndicate which will operate a chain of theaters in Altoona, Lancaster, Johnstown and Harrisburg. Around $75,000 was thought to be the amount involved in the transaction.

The Palace moving picture theater, of Emaus, Pa., which was badly damaged a few months ago by fire, reopened on April 11th. The theater has undergone several improvements, among which are the installation of a new system of wiring and the re-arranging of the exits. In making the changes the owner had but one object in view and that was the welfare and safety of his patrons.

Local moving picture theaters are proving an important factor in Philadelphia's "clean-up week" campaign. All moving picture theaters and houses have been supplied with a series of slides made up in an attractive manner, advertising the date of "clean-up week" and giving hints as to what should be done to rid the city of dirt. This co-operation on the part of the moving picture houses has brought forth much favorable comment from the public and the city officials and has considerably helped the movement.

The construction of a moving picture theater is under way at Seventeenth and Venango streets for the Tioga Realty Company. The building will be 120 by 120 feet and will have an entrance wing 42 feet wide. The approximate cost of construction will be about $50,000, and when completed the theater will have a seating capacity of 2,000 patrons.

The Lyric moving picture theater of Allentown, Pa., has again reopened after being closed for a period of several weeks, during which time it was undergoing several improvements. CONGDON.

NORTHWESTERN NEW YORK.

GEORGE W. ERDMANN has been appointed manager of the new Elwood Moving Picture Theater, Buffalo, which will open at an early date. An outline of Mr. Erdmann's plans and a description of the house will be given later.

"We are planning to use all the best of the big productions as they come along," said William Leyser, Jr., manager of the Marlowe Moving Picture Theater, Buffalo. "Our policy is to satisfy all our patrons all the time." He recently played to capacity "The Stranglers of Paris."

Moving pictures showing Mr. and Mrs. Vernon Castle in modern dances were given recently at the Teck Theater, Buffalo.

"The Three Musketeers" has been booked by Manager Edel, of the Strand Moving Picture Theater, Buffalo.

Harry C. Fox has been appointed treasurer of the Gayety Theater, Buffalo, a burlesque house, which occasionally plays moving pictures.

The Olympic Theater Co., which is remodeling the old Lafayette Theater, Buffalo, is still being blocked. A notice has been served to stop the remodeling of the old building, alleging that all such work was in violation of the city ordinances providing for exits and entrances.

The Stratford Theater Co., Inc., will build a $200,000 theater at the northeast corner of Court and Franklin streets, Buffalo, for the production of drama. The incorporators include Postmaster William F. Kasting and William G. Houck, of Buffalo, and Ansel E. Whitcheck, of Detroit.

Why the Strand Theatre Uses

Simplex

This wonderful Broadway Theatre (largest in the world) represents the very latest knowledge in picture theatre construction. In each of its many departments, no expense has been spared to obtain THE BEST RESULTS. We quote from the Strand program, the reasons for installing SIMPLEX.

"Realizing that only the highest possible grade of projection will suffice for our patrons, we have made many exacting tests of motion picture machines, with the result that these pictures are projected by the well known Simplex Projector, the product of the Precision Machine Company of New York City.

"Our experimental tests have convinced us that this machine represents the very best in motion picture construction, its projection being rock steady and without flicker. As it is the only entirely enclosed machine on the market, we believe its claims for absolute fireproofness are amply justified.

"Our operating room is at all times under their expert supervision, and is replete with every appliance which modern scientific knowledge affords."

The Strand projection is the best on earth. You can have the same by installing a

This is the first accurate analysis of small-town life made in the United States. The survey was made under the direction of the University of Kansas. The town has a population of 2,300. The chart showing where the people go starts with 2,300 a year to dances and reaches its height with an aggregate attendance of 105,000 a year at the moving picture show. The report made this pertinent comment on the recreation phase of small city life. "Few in Belleville replied that 'the movies' were the favorite form of recreation, yet the grand aggregate attendance of the one moving picture show in the place was over one hundred thousand annually according to a careful estimate. A careful account of the proportion of attendants by age groups develops the fact that in Belleville only 30 per cent. of moving picture goers were under 16; 70 per cent. or more that two-thirds were 16 years or over and of these the larger proportion were over 25 years old. These statistics tend to show that for the small community the bulk of the audience is drawn from adults and not from children, and that therefore from the commercial standpoint the moving picture company cannot be expected to adapt its films to the needs of childhood. Community action is necessary to reach the situation, but the individual community is quite helpless; it is only by co-operation with the other communities on the moving picture circuit that the control of the character of the film may be secured."

George I. Appleby, formerly assistant manager of the Mutual's Boston offices, is now installed as manager of the Mutual's offices in the Fidelity building, Portland, Maine. Mr. Appleby will handle all Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine business from this office.

On Wednesday, April 15, General Manager J. A. Eslow, N. E. Universal Film Exchange, Boston, held a private exhibition of "Samson" at the Huntington Avenue Theater, for exhibitors only. Quite a large gathering of film men gathered together for the special showing, and "Samson" scored a distinct success as being a production of unusually fine quality. Mr. Eslow reports that his advance bookings on "Samson" testify to the regard in which the reels are held by the exhibitors in his territory.

Ralph Severn, auditor of the Mutual's Boston offices, reports he has handed in his resignation, to take effect on May first. Mr. Severn has accepted an attractive offer in another line of business for the present, although it is probable that he will return to the film business before many months have passed.

Chief petty officer of U. S. ships in Boston harbor visited Boston theaters on April 14, and ordered all men connected with the ships to report on board immediately. A great many sailors were found in the West End theaters and in the uptown theaters. At the request of the naval authorities, the managements announced that all officers and men were wanted on board the Tacoma immediately. This action was due to the sailing of the ships to Mexican waters.

Worcester, Mass., has adopted an innovation to encourage the citizens in their devotion to their home towns. Moving pictures are to play a most prominent part in a campaign which has been started by Mayor Wright. A series of moving pictures will be taken of this city, depicting its development, its municipal methods, and its public institutions. Everything that may aid the people to realize and remember that they owe a debt to the city will be done.

A recent incorporation is the Sagamore Park Development, Recreation and Amusement Company, at Kittery, Me. The firm has incorporated for $50,000, with the following named as the officers: J. H. Sharrott, Worcester, Mass.; T. P. Bryce, C. H. Stewart, Portsmouth, N. H.; H. Mitchell, H. A. Paul, of Kittery.

The Connellan Amusement Company has incorporated at Portland, Me., for $10,000, with James A. Connellan, W. A. Connellan and James Maxwell as the officers.

The Master Production Film Company has incorporated at Boston for $18,000. Abraham M. Greenblatt, Joseph M. and Max L. Levenson are the incorporators.

Still another new concern is the Safety Projector and Film Company, of Portland, Me. A. F. Jones, A. A. Richards and B. M. Maxwell are the promoters.

The Board of Health at Cohasset, Mass., has ordered that the Town Hall must not be used for any entertainments, because of an epidemic of scarlet fever.

On the evening of April 12 the Congress Hall Theater, South Boston, had a short circuit, as did the Olympic Theater, of this city. The performance at the former was discontinued after the lights went out and failed to reappear in half an hour.

Startling statements to the effect that persons have been attempting to "hold up" Boston people on the strength of promises of moving picture licences, among other things, since the present administration came into power, were made by Mayor James F. Curley this week. The declaration of these charges led to the discovery that attempts at "graft" by trading on the mayor's name began even prior to the latter's election. Marks Harris, of 72 Lawrence avenue, Roxbury, who is an applicant for a license for a photoplay theater at the corner of Humboldt avenue and Townsend street, Roxbury, declared that he had been approached by an architect, who gave him to understand that for $100 he would make certain the securing of a moving picture theater license for Harris. The latter claims he did not pay the money, and did not give the architect's name. It was the mayor's intention to give a public hearing upon Harris' application, and on an application made by Jerome Pettell, a prominent Progressive leader of the North End, Boston, who wants license for a moving picture house at 392 Hanover street, on April 16. This hearing was not held and the mayor promised some sensational disclosures in the "graft line," in connection with this hearing. The reason for not holding the hearing is due to the fact that notices had been sent out, announcing that the hearing would take place on April 22. As a result, there was no one on hand for the hearing on April 16. The mayor declared that if he found that anyone who applies for a moving picture license has paid anyone else to use influence to secure such license, he will refuse to grant the license, and if he discovers any evidence in this direction, after a license has been granted, the license will be revoked. The idea appears to be that people are seeking graft money by claiming to be able to influence Mr. Curley, and the latter intends to prosecute the matter to the limit, and has called in the police commissioner to track things down. Regarding moving picture licenses, it has been Mayor Curley's habit to hold up all applications for licenses in cases where objections have been raised until public hearings could be given, and to hold up the applications until after the hearings. The mayor has called a meeting for April 22, to consider various applications pending, and if he finds that money has been paid to any person for any favor or privilege, he will reject the application.

By all odds, the event of the week in Boston film circles revolved around James H. Donovan, general representative of the N. E. Universal Film Exchange, who signed up the largest 50-50 contract of his career—by his marriage to Miss Lillian Fay, of Flora street, Brookline, Mass. The ceremony was performed at St. Mary's Church, Brookline, by Father McManus. Frank M. Fay, of the Boston Post, was best man, while Miss Nellie Donovan, the groom's sister, was the bride of honor. Mr. and Mrs. Donovan departed for their honeymoon immediately after the ceremony.

Dr. J. Heiuz and J. Kenyom, who are connected with the Pawtucket Hospital, Pawtucket, R. I., have taken over the lease of the Bijou Theater, Manville, R. I., which they will run as a moving picture house. Whatever profits may accrue from the Bijou will be turned in to the hospital fund.

No more moving picture theater licenses for wooden buildings was the edict of Mayor James M. Curley, of Boston. During the four years of his administration abandoned churches, etc., of wooden construction, that are often bought up by prospective exhibitors, cannot be turned into theaters. The mayor feels that there is too much danger of conflagration, and adequate protection cannot be given to the lives of people who would frequent them. In addition, the mayor stated that he will take up with the proprietors of theaters now established in wooden buildings, the question of a change. He said that he would not be harsh in his treatment of them, but will ask a gradual change to buildings of metal construction.

The "Quo Vadis?" reels, which had a long run at the Tremont Theater, Boston, last summer, will return to the Hub next week, to be shown at Tremont Temple. There will be afternoon and evening shows, Friday nights excepted.

Huge sunspots, volcanic craters upon the surface of the moon, the wonderful rings surrounding the planet Saturn, were among the astronomical wonders shown by B. R. Baumgardt at Tremont Temple, Boston, in his motion pictures, entitled "An Evening with the Stars."

Fred B. Murphy is now in the new offices he secured for the World Film's Boston branch, at 41-43 Winchester street. Large and commodious quarters tell the story of Mr. Murphy's new home, with every facility needed to run a first-class film exchange. A large exhibition room, where exhibitors may give World Film releases "the once over," are now being whipped into shape.

Mr. Martin Dempsey is thinking of building a moving picture theater at Milford, Mass., this summer.

Elbridge L. Campbell reports that his new Dreamland Theater, Bellows Falls, Vt., is a "husky Youngster," and the business has been on the increase since the new management took control. The Dreamland was purchased last month from T. F. Kinery.

S. Z. Poli, who owns the Hyperion Theater, New Haven, Conn., will take over this house on May 1. Mr. Poli will make extensive alterations in the Hyperion, and it will be one of the finest theaters in New England.

Manager D. D. Scullen has completed one of the longest "stock" seasons in the history of the Broadway Theater, Springfield, Mass., and once again is offering vaudeville and photoplays, at popular prices.

Quite a tempest in a tea pot was stirred up at Springfield, Mass., by the edict that all motion picture theaters should be closed on Sundays, after April 26. Representatives of the stage employees, musicians, bill posters, and moving picture operators' unions have protested against this order, and the mayor gave a hearing to them on April 9. It is hoped that he will rescind the order and allow a shown, in modified form, to be given on Sundays. The question of Sunday moving picture shows is a troublesome one in many New England cities, as there is constant agitation against them, on the part of the clergy and others.

Manager F. J. Carroll, of the Merrimack Square Theater, Lowell, Mass., plays vaudeville and picture programs on Sundays, but stock shows on other dates.

William Pollock is managing the Academy at Lowell, Mass. HENRY.

Thomas Burke, Jr., of Fullerton street, this city, has erected a two-story brick motion picture theater at No. 53 Fullerton street.

The theater erected by B. McCann, on Main street, Osceola Mills, Pa., has been completed. The house is one of the best in that section and has been doing a good business since the opening. The property cost to erect $12,000.

A Pennsylvania charter of incorporation has been applied for by M. H. Goldstein, B. Goldstein and Arthur D. Gatz, for an intended corporation to be known as the Morris Amusement Company. The company will lease and operate motion picture theaters. L. S. Levis, Berger building, this city, is their attorney.

The interior of the Theatorium, on Hickory street, Warren, Pa., has been entirely remodeled, and new seating installed. The house is owned by the Parmelee & Henry Estate, National Bank building, Warren, Pa. The improvements to the interior of the theater have increased the capacity besides making the house of a better appearance. The floor was lowered and columns that formerly obstructed the view to some extent were removed. The improvements amounted to about $3,000.

MANLEY.

ST. LOUIS, MO.

THE Shubert Theater, after a successful run with "The Life of Our Savior," a Pathe feature, has resumed its regular dramatic bill. It is reported, however, that the Shubert will run through the Summer season with a program of pictures.

Francis X. Bushman, the Essanay player, is the winner of the fifth week's popular player contest that is being conducted by the St. Louis Times. The winners in each week's voting are barred from further participation until the last week of the contest, when all of the winners will be voted on to determine who is the most popular of them all. Crane Wilbur, J. Warren Kerrigan, Naomi Childers and Rosemary Theby were the winners of the four preceding contests.

The Pohattan Theater, an airdome in Maplewood, is being made ready for the summer season by a thorough cleaning, painting and general overhauling.

G. K. Dubis, proprietor of the Pathe Theater, at 1026 Franklin avenue, claims that his place is the oldest moving picture house in St. Louis. The Pathe gives a four-reel Mutual program, changes every day, and uses all second run films, playing to good business at every performance. The Pathe is one of the few theaters that still use the talking pictures with the actors behind the screen interpreting the action of the reel in words. Mr. Dubis says this feature never seems to grow old with his audiences, and that he finds it one of the theater's chief attractions.

Mr. Dustin states that he has ten sets of the "Perils of Pauline" films running in local houses.

D. R. Anderson, secretary and treasurer of the American Theater Curtain and Supply Company, which has changed its name to Atsco, Inc., of New York, has returned to St. Louis after a three weeks' stay in New York, where he was employed at transferring the records and accounts of the company to their new head office.

The Park Theater, one of the largest houses operated by the Grand Avenue Amusement Company, which was opened in January with Sullivan and Considine vaudeville, has changed its program from vaudeville to pictures. The new program was inaugurated with "Les Miserables," which ran for a week to good houses.

The threatened closing of tent shows seems to have been warded off, for the time being at least. For a while it looked as though all exhibitors who operated under canvas would have to close their doors before June first, in obedience to the order of the building commissioner's office. It appears now, however, that the exhibitors have taken the matter up to the Supreme Court for the decision as to whether the building commissioner has jurisdiction in the cases. And in the meantime the city councilor will accept license fees and hold them until the matter is decided.

Never mind now how many—Mrs. Herb said it was the first time since she wore short dresses that she was sorry she wasn't older. Which is going Chief of Police Halbauer one better. Dave hid his wife's shoes so she couldn't go to the picture show. And now Mrs. Dave sleeps with her shoes on." Swann's latest stunt was the benefit performance given for the Junior class of the high school. For this occasion was selected the Lubin picture, "Banty Tim." The hero of this poem from the Hon. "One despairs of the value of censorship of moving pictures when he sees the restriction put upon the films used as the leading advertisement to attract people to see them," says the Evanston News. 'Children Not Allowed' is blazoned in flaming letters on the billboards announcing 'The Scarlet Letter,' and no doubt with immense success. If there is anything more likely to provoke the interest and curiosity of boys and girls who just escape being children than such an opportunity to avail themselves of the dignity of their fourteen and fifteen years, we are at a loss to know what it is. We are equally helpless to imagine any class of spectators to whom a questionable picture may do more harm."

The opening of the Apollo Theater in Peoria about May 1 will give that city one of the most richly equipped and most lavishly decorated exclusive motion picture theaters in the United States, it is declared. James Powers of Kellogg, Ia. has purchased the moving picture theater at Monroe, Ia.

Newell Weyer has sold his interest in the Zenith Theater at Shenandoah, Ia., to his partner, C. A. Hamilton. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton will operate the house.

The Lyric, the pioneer moving picture theater in Lyons, Ia., has been closed and will be supplanted by a modern photoplay house seating about 800, to be erected in Second Street by Redden & Donlan and Donlan Brothers. Miss Margaret Whalen has been manager of the house for the last few years of its successful career.

Meris Goldman has accepted the management of the Star moving picture theater at Michigan Street and Grand Avenue in Grand Rapids, Mich.

E. J. Butler, manager of the Star Theater at Negaunee, Mich., has closed a contract to exhibit the features of the Famous Players, the All Star Company and the Jesse L. Lasky Company.

Moving picture and other theaters in Jackson, Mich., which have been giving away merchandise prizes by drawings were hit in an order issued by Chief of Police Chase which stopped the practice. It is said that some of the competing managers welcomed the order as the rivalry in this form of advertising had become a serious question.

The New Lyric Theater at 210 State Street, St. Joseph, Mich., has been opened by F. G. Hows. As an advertising attraction an Edison moving picture machine will be given to the boy or girl delivering the most coupons to the box office before June 15. "High class and comical songs" are announced.

"Les Miserables" was featured in two Findlay, Ohio houses on the same date. The performance started at the Victory half an hour later than at the Royal.

The Bijou Theater at Grand Rapids, Wis., has installed a new Motiograph, making the second needed machine.

The Empire Theater at Chippewa Falls, Wis. seems to do very nicely with four changes a week, verifying the assertion that it pays to repeat good pictures.

Arthur H. Gray has sold his interest in the Rex Theater at Oshkosh, Wis., to the Cummins Amusement Company. Andrew Haben retains his interest in the house.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

KALEM.

THE DETECTIVE'S SISTER (Special—2 parts—May 6).—Detective Burke is devoted to his sister Anna, an invalid. The officer is assigned to run down the man who has burglarized the Graves mansion. Finger prints cause him to search for Hurley, known as the "Gentleman Burglar." After selling his loot to a "fence," Hurley strolls through the park and comes upon Anna, asleep in her invalid chair. The book she had been reading falls to the ground. Hurley picks it up. The invalid awakens. The two engage in conversation.

The burglar meets Anna in the park every day. A child mischievously takes a snapshot of the two. Fearing lest it fall in the hands of the police, Hurley purchases the film and developes it himself. As his lore for Anna deepens, the man grows ashamed of his life of crime. Burke discovers Hurley's whereabouts. Shortly afterwards, the burglar attempts to enter a house. Thought of Anna causes him to draw back. He resolves to live straight and buys back the Graves loot from the "fence" with the intention of restoring it.

The man returns home. Burke enters his room and places him under arrest. Hurley's story of his redemption is greeted jeeringly. Burke discovers Anna's picture on the table and demands to know how it came into the burglar's hands. He learns the story. In rage, he handcuffs Hurley and drags him off to his own home. It is his intention to expose Hurley's character to Anna. But when the two arrive, Burke learns that Anna is dying of heart disease. The girl is calling her lover. Hurley enters after his captor. Broken-hearted, the burglar kneels by the side of the bed. As Burke unlocks the handcuffs, Hurley takes Anna in his arms. A moment later, the girl smiles and passes away. Blinded with tears, Hurley holds out his hands to the heart-broken brother. A warm hand-clasp between the two and Hurley leaves the room with the gyves upon his wrists.

McBRIDE'S BRIDE (May 8).—Mrs. Highbrow is a candidate for the office of police magistrate in Birdville, a town where equal suffrage prevails. McBride, a young dentist, incurs the enmity of the woman when he declines to come to the aid of her cause. The dentist later meets Helen, Mrs. Highbrow's daughter, and promptly falls in love with her. But the mother frowns upon his suit and orders him off her premises. Undaunted, the lovers secure a marriage license and plan to elope that night. At ten o'clock, McBride ascends a ladder to the window of his beloved. Impish Fate causes Mrs. Highbrow to gaze out of her window and she discovers the immitation Romeo. Mistaking him for a burglar, she shouts for help. McBride falls off the ladder in fright, landing in the arms of a policeman. The lover is arrested and yanked off to the lock-up.

Mrs. Highbrow, as magistrate, tries McBride the following morning. The proceedings are disturbed when Helen rushes into the court room and throws her arms about her lover. Mrs. Highbrow orders Jack returned to the cell. Helen refuses to be separated from him and the jailer is compelled to place them both in the cell. Billy News, a reporter friend of McBride's, hits upon a plan to assist the lovers. Hastening to the home of a minister he engages the dominie to the jail. While Mrs. Highbrow is trying another case, McBride and his bride are married. Shortly afterwards, the police magistrate summons McBride before her. Just as she is about to pronounce sentence, she discovers that the trembling culprit is now her son-in-law. Realizing she has been outwitted, Mrs. Highbrow suspends McBride's sentence and gives the young couple her blessing.

THE NEW MEDICINE MAN (May 9).—Red Moon goes to meet his son, Tall Feather, who is on his way home from medical college. Like Laughing Water, his son's sweetheart, Red Moon expects to see Tall Feather return a blanketed Indian. When the stage coach arrives, Red Moon is greeted by an immaculately clad youth. The father stares at the son, who has adopted the white man's dress. Later, Tall Feather meets Laughing Water. His altered appearance and ways disappoint her bitterly. Tall Feather makes an enemy of Two Buffaloes, the tribal Medicine Man. The latter gazes with suspicion upon the young physician's method of treating sickness and incites the tribe against him. The red men decide to go on the warpath. Knowing the power of the white men, Tall Feather tries to dissuade his people from their rash step. He is mocked for his pains. Laughing Water adds to his humiliation by striking him across the face when he refuses to don his war paint.

Before the tribe can attack the whites, some of their number are stricken with fever. Unable to cure them, Two Buffaloes warns his people to flee. Tall Feather stays with the stricken men. Laughing Water, who has fled with the rest of the tribe, is suddenly taken ill. Knowing the Medicine Man can do nothing for her, the chief sends for Tall Feather. The doctor hastens to his sweetheart's side. His treatment gradually restores her to health. Two Buffaloes rails against the boy and warns his tribe of the wrath of the gods. Angered, Chief Roaring Lion drives the Medicine Man from camp. Laughing Water realizes that the knowledge Tall Feather has gained at the white man's school has saved her life. She begs his forgiveness. Chief Roaring Lion, grateful for Tall Feather's efforts in saving the tribe from a terrible fate, asks the young doctor to instruct his people in the ways of the white men.

EDISON.

A WEEK-END AT HAPPYHURST (May 4).—When Mr. Lowe asked Mr. Glink to come out to Happyhurst for the week-end, rosy-colored visions flitted before Mr. Glink's eyes. So he accepted Lowe's invitation with many protestations of gratitude. When Lowe and Glink arrived at the Happyhurst station, they found that they would be obliged to walk to Lowe's house. There were only three or four feet of snow on the ground, and Glink was neither used nor adapted to walking at any considerable length through the drifts. However, after a few unpleasant experiences, they arrived at Lowe's house.

The next twenty-four hours were a veritable nightmare to Glink. Mr. Lowe impressed the fact upon him that he should make the best of his opportunity to get plenty of exercise in the fresh country air. Poor Glink was obliged to work like a horse, shoveling snow, chopping wood and carrying coal. Owing to an unfortunate shortage in the household supplies, the meals consisted entirely of beans—cold beans.

That night, Klink was routed out of his chilly bed and forced to go down and sleep on a mattress in the hall, owing to a sudden outbreak of chiken pox in a neighbor's house. The unaffected children had to have his bed. Glink was aroused from his new sleeping place by Lowe's children jumping playfully on his stomach.

After Glink had been forcibly pressed into a sledding party whence he emerged with a badly scratched face, and after he had been drenched by a bursting pipe, he executed manoeuvre technically known as "a quiet sneak" back to the peaceful city, where, rushing to a restaurant, he ordered everything on the menu except beans.

THE DOUBLE CROSS—Third Story of "The Man Who Disappeared" (May 5).—It will be remembered that John Perriton, after taking the blame of a murder to save the brother of the girl he loved, escaped to Long Island, and after a series of exciting adventures managed to evade the relentless pursuit on the part of the detective. By cleverly assuming the identity of another man, he managed to utilize preparations which had been made for the other's escape. The Chinese opium joint to which Perriton was finally brought proved to have disadvantages in addition to its obvious advantage as a haven of refuge. Before he had been there a week, Perriton was forced to join a band of criminals to avoid instant betrayal to the police.

A foxy-eyed little lawyer named Lipmann, and a burly "strong-arm" man named "Biceps" were the chief agents in the present scheme of Perriton's new associates. The scheme was gorgeously simple. An advertisement was inserted in the newspapers to the effect that an heiress desired to meet a wealthy young farmer with matrimonial inclinations. The wealthy young farmer had already been found. It remained to arrange the details of taking his money away from him. According to the plan, Perriton was to act as the girl's brother. It was arranged that a letter should be sent to the man, directing him to come to the supposed home of his intended bride with a certified check as a proof of his wealth.

The plan worked out beautifully. The young man called at the beautiful apartment which the gang had arranged, and was agreeably surprised by the appearance of the girl. Curiously enough, two things happened for which the gang had made no provision. For one thing, the girl fell in love with the man she was supposed to cheat. For another, Perriton had firmly resolved from the beginning that he would in some way upset the scheme. Owing largely to his endeavors, the girl confessed her duplicity to the young man, and was forgiven by him. To escape from "Biceps," who was waiting outside the door, the pair left the room by the fire escape. When "Biceps" rushed in and started shooting at the escaping couple, Perriton stepped behind him and knocked him unconscious. Then Perriton escaped by way of the dumb waiter. When the astounded police broke in they found nothing but the body of the unconscious "Biceps."

THE LUCKY VEST (May 6).—Tom Flynn had only been graduated from medical school for a very short time and he had not been overwhelmed with any tremendous rush of patients. When he was called to attend Old Abram, and discovered after he had saved the old man's life that he was not going to be paid for his services, Tom merely shrugged his shoulders. He was used to it. Fancy his surprise when a parcel was brought to him some time later containing a vest of curious pattern and a note from Old Abram to the effect that the vest would bring him luck if he had been born on a Thursday.

Despite the scepticism, Tom was impressed. As it happened, he had been born on Thursday. So he put on the vest. From the very moment he did so, his luck changed. By curious chances, he gained several rich patients; a distant relative died and left him a western ranch and a tremendous amount of money; and best of all, he met, fell in love with, and married the finest girl in the world. One morning, after he had been married for some time, Tom left home hastily on a hurry call and forgot to put on his vest. He nearly broke his neck on the front steps; the automobile broke down, and Tom was arrested for attempting to climb into a car belonging to somebody else.

Meanwhile, Tom's wife had given the vest to Homeless Hogan. Homeless Hogan happened to have been born on Friday, and the vest did not do him any particular good. Half an hour after he had put it on, he was arrested for attempted larceny, and thrown into the same cell with the doctor. The doctor was in an anguished frame of mind on account of a letter he had received shortly before his arrest, telling him that his money was probably gone. He cheered up immediately at the sight of Homeless Hogan and the vest. The police officials were somewhat surprised at the doctor's freuzied attempt to take a dilapidated vest from a dirty tramp, but after he had proved his claim to the property, allowed him to put it on. At once his luck changed. He was released, and found a telegram waiting at home telling him that his money was safe.

THE SONG OF SOLOMON (Special—2 parts—May 8).—Like his fairly well-known namesake, Solomon was a singer of songs. The only reason that he did not sit on an oriental rug titfully suiting a lyre was that Mr. Best, who employed him, considered the better results would be obtained by allowing Solomon to sit on a piano stool and smite a piano. But like his great namesake, Solomon had a lot of trouble with a woman. The woman in the case of this latter day Solomon was not the Queen of Sheba. Her name was Trixie. But this is anticipating our story. The whole business started when Solomon suddenly was visited with an inspiration. A little lilting tune came into his head, and at the first few notes of it, Solomon knew that he had a great popular tune. Unfortunately, at almost the same moment, Solomon had a terrible row with Mr. Best, and was summarily dismissed.

Solomon decided that there was only one thing to be done. He must interest Trixie, the comic opera star, in his song. If Trixie sang it, Solomon's fortune was made. Otherwise—but Solomon refused to consider the awful things that might happen. In the innocence of his childlike nature, Solomon called at the theater under the impression that Trixie would see him. Speedily undeceived in this respect, he wrote her a letter which Trixie threw into the fire unopened. Nor did he meet with greater success when he attempted to speak to her in a restaurant. Meanwhile, the necessities of eating and sleeping were putting Solomon's financial affairs in a highly alarming state. When finally he had nothing more to pawn, he decided on one desperately brilliant play. With a suitcase loaded with bricks, he arrived at Trixie's hotel, hired a suite of rooms and rented a piano. Sitting at the latter, he played and sang his song.

After two days of disappointment, when Solomon was on the verge of giving up, Trixie heard the song, and sent for the composer. But Solomon, like his namesake, was very wise, and sent word back to Trixie that if she wanted to speak to him, she could come and see him. Trixie came, listened, and accepted the song. A week later, everybody in New York was whistling it, and Solomon was devoting his masterly intellect to the problem of avoiding the income tax.

THE END OF THE UMBRELLA (Seventh of the "Dolly of the Dailies"—May 9).—The Aqueduct Construction Company has been having a good deal of trouble with certain anarchistic elements, who, anxious to seize any cause of discontent to further the bloody revolution they hoped for, opposed the building of the great pipe which would carry fresh sparkling water to the crowded people of the great city. Finally, after the company had been worried half to death by annonymous threats, a tremendous explosion killed a couple of dozen workmen and completely wrecked the main section of the great work. Dolly Desmond, in the city office of the newspaper, heard of the catastrophe and begged the editor to allow her to investigate it. The editor, who had formed a high opinion of Dolly's character, readily consented, and Dolly set out for the scene of the disaster.

As she wandered about the wrecked aqueduct, she came upon a curious umbrella handle in among several pieces of a shattered bomb. Dolly kept her find and said nothing about it to anybody. With some little difficulty, she succeeded in obtaining a position as cashier in the dining room of the little hotel near the works. She had the umbrella handle placed on a new umbrella, put it in the stand where she could keep her eye on it, and settled herself to watch. It wasn't as easy a matter to devote her entire attention to the stand as she had thought at first, for Grant, a young engineer at the works, fell madly in love with her, and insisted on talking to her at every opportunity. At last, when she was on the point of giving up in disgust, a shifty-eyed individual picked up the umbrella, started to go out with it, and then apparently remembering, looked at it, put it down and looked frightened. Dolly recognized him as "Wutty Jim," one of the lodgers in the hotel. That eve-

VITAGRAPH.

CUPID VERSUS MONEY (May 4).—Although very attractive, Mary Drew is a modern type of bachelor-maid and suffragette, with a strong aversion of marriage. When her uncle urges her to marry, she flatly refuses. Telling her, "None of my money will be frittered away on crazy reforms," he puts a clause in his will, stating, if she does not marry, she will be disinherited. Tom Hardy, a dissolute young man, is ordered out of the house by his father, and becomes a common drunkard.

Mary calls on Harvey, the family lawyer, learns of the clause, and is told that a marriage of convenience is the only way to get around it. The lawyer explains that, for a thousand dollars, he can arrange it, and the man can disappear after the ceremony. Mary gives her consent to the plan. Harvey mentions the proposition to Tom, who, with the prospect of so much "easy money," readily agrees to all conditions. He is introduced to Mary, who treats him very coldly and superciliously. Immediately after the ceremony, to everyone's consternation, Mr. Drew insists that the young couple stay and live with him. Tom soon begins to like Mary, but she hardly condescends to notice him.

Uncle goes away for his health, and Tom, so deeply in love with his wife, overcomes a desire to go back to his old habits, invests his thousand dollars in a neat little house and secures a position with Harvey. Mary begins to admire and finally to love him, but pride prevents her showing it. Uncle brings his wife home and immediately there is trouble. Severe quarrels ensue between the two women, and Drew is obliged to ask Mary and her husband to seek other quarters. She bursts out crying, but Tom tells her of his love and asks her to share his little home. After humbly apologizing for her rude treatment, she confesses she has loved him for a long time. They are soon in each other's arms, and Cupid once more triumphs over Mammon.

THE OLD FIRE HORSE AND THE NEW FIRE CHIEF (Special—2 parts—May 5).—The Women's Progressive League of Williamsville, headed by Mrs. Banks, hold a mass meeting to protest against the inefficiency of the local fire department. They visit the mayor, with the result that Bunny, the old fire chief, is ousted and Mrs. Bangs elected in his place as the new fire chief. She has some trouble in her new position, but soon overcomes all obstacles. Williamsville purchases a motor engine and the faithful old fire horses are auctioned off as worthless, the old chief's pet being sold to a peddler. Returning from a visit out of town, the old chief learns of the sale and is heartbroken. By chance he finds the horse and buys him. Later he finds his old buggy in the rubbish pile of the fire house. A fire breaks out and the new chief tells the maid to 'phone the men to call for her in the auto engine.

The new fire chief, after much primping and delay, gets dressed, jumps into the auto engine, and they go tearing past the old chief, with his fire horse and buggy, but the machine breaks down and Bunny soon catches up. He takes a few of the boys in his buggy and races off to the fire. In the meantime, the other firemen arrive at the fire, but can do nothing until Mrs. Bangs arrives. An invalid is in the burning house, but no one dare enter. The old chief dashes up, assumes command and starts things going in a hurry. The invalid is rescued just before the roof falls in. The motor is at last started and the new chief arrives, but everyone shouts for their old chief's reinstatement. Bunny is re-appointed, amid great cheering and generously shares honors with the old fire horse.

SANDY AND SHORTY START SOMETHING (May 6).—Strolling by a large roller skate factory, Sandy and Shorty, those inimitable tramps, spy a truck with a case of roller skates on it. They "borrow" the team and go for a joy-ride. The factory foreman discovers the loss and notifies the police, who start out in pursuit. The case is jarred off the wagon, swashed open and the skates thrown in all directions. A crowd collects and soon men, women and children are cutting up some astonishing capers, trying to skate. The police take the wrong turn at a fork in the road and are obliged to return. Sandy and Shorty notice the case is gone. They leave the wagon, mount the horse and ride back. Meeting a Hebrew push-cart peddler asleep beside the road, they leave the horse and take his cart. Sandy seats himself in it, insisting Shorty push him back to town. The Jew wakes up and is astonished to find a horse in the place where his cart had been. However, he mounts the beast; and on the way to town, finds the wagon. The villagers are cavorting dizzily around on the skates and Sandy and Shorty join the gyrating crowd. The police arrive and are seen by the two hoboes, who make a comical getaway on their skates. After collecting the skates from the townspeople, and giving the peddler his push-cart, the police taking possession of the horse and wagon and the skates. The villagers spend the next few days nursing bruises and sprains. Sandy and Shorty hang to the rear of the speeding wagon on its way back to the factory, until they lose their hold and land upside down in the road. They then try various freak methods of progress on their skates, but finally compromise on plain walking The factory foreman gives them a quarter for the return of their skates. They spend the money for liniment and proceed to alleviate the pain of their aching limbs.

HIS LAST CALL (May 7).—Cyril Huntington, a one-time Broadway star favorite and originator of the part of "The Soldier" in "The Soldier of the Empire," is unable to secure an engagement on account of his age, grey hair, old style of acting, etc. Illness and other misfortunes have dwindled his savings to almost nothing, so that he is in dire circumstances. At the booking offices he receives such answers as "tomorrow at eleven," "stop in some time next week," etc. The boys on the Rialto turn a deaf ear to him and his hand is shaken only by his brother professionals in his own predicament or worse. In the theatrical boarding house, where he has lived for years, he is in arrears for four weeks' board and is saved from eviction by the kind loan of a chorus girl.

Next morning, Huntington learns from the newspapers that his old manager, Steven Adams, for whom he had laid the foundation of a fortune, is to have a revival of "The Soldier of the Empire," the play he made famous in the portrayal of "The Soldier." He goes to Adam's office, and begs to be allowed to play his old part, but is refused, as Adams wants a younger man to play it. He is finaly dismissed with a pass for the opening performance. Crestfallen and broken-hearted, the first night finds him in the last row of an aisle seat. Ralph Morton, the leading man, greatly under the influence of liquor, is unable to go on with the performance, and Adams, looking through the peephole of the curtain, decides as a last resort to have Huntington go on for his old part. An usher is sent for him and after assuring Adams that he remembers the lines perfectly, is told to go ahead.

Some of the old-timers in the audience remember him and he makes a bigger hit than the revival itself. He is called before the curtain many times and makes a short speech. On his return, behind the curtain, the excitement, the congratulations of his fellow-actors, prove too much of a shock. His head falls back and with a smile on his lips, he expires. Adams, close by, reverently tells the boys that Huntington has made "His Last Call."

The Banker's Daughter

IN FIVE PARTS By Bronson Howard

A few territories still left open. State right buyers who are interested in this production wire to us at our expense and we will send our representative with a print for screen examination.

Read what unbiased critics have said:

"We should have more photoplays, such as 'The Banker's Daughter.' It is just the sort of food our story-hungry producers crave. The plot is plausible and plenty big enough for treatment in five reels. There are tense dramatic moments. The acting is excellent."—Dramatic Mirror.

"'The Banker's Daughter' possesses the undoubted virtue of presenting a well sustained story of interest, interspersed with several scenes of highly dramatic nature. The duelling scenes are well staged bits of realism, are of exceptional merit and cleverly shown. The photography is good and the light effects beautiful. The work of the actors is remarkably clean cut and artistic."—Clipper.

"'The Banker's Daughter' will be remembered by many as one of America's most popular dramas. The motion picture production has been staged in a most effective manner, which the splendid photography displays to good advantage."—Billboard.

"One of the few productions in which careful work, coupled with intelligence, has made straight for success as if backed by years of experience. 'The Banker's Daughter' will rank high among photodramas of the day, among the best five reel features now being shown."—Harrison, Moving Picture World.

Green, falls in love with her and tries to propose, but is interrupted by Euphemia Jones, Daisy's spinster cousin, who has determined to marry Mr. Bunny herself. He then proposes by letter to Daisy, and asks her to meet him at the fountain in the park. At the same time he angrily writes a curt note to Euphemia, saying he does not wish to see her or hear of her again and encloses a check in compliance with her request, to help establish a home for cats. Unfortunately, he gets the envelopes mixed up, sending the curt note and check to Daisy and the proposal to Euphemia. He soon learns his awful mistake when he meets the blushing spinster at the fountain. She coquettes with him and he scorns her. In revenge, she starts a suit for breach of promise. Bunny calls on Daisy and she angrily refuses to see him. Finally, he decides to leave the country in the disguise of the Sultana of Korocko. Euphemia goes to the railroad station with Daisy and her mother, who have also decided to go to Europe. After they have entered the train, Bunny, completely disguised as the Oriental potentate, enters the station. Euphemia attempts to start a conversation with the supposed royalty, and Bunny, in his haste to break away, drops his card case. After they have gone, she finds it and recognizing Bunny's plan, follows him. There is an awful complication when Bunny and his party meet the real Sultana on the boat and barely manage to escape in the excitement, to their staterooms. Euphemia arrives, and seeing the real Sultana, accuses her of being a fraud. She yanks off the lady's yashmak, or face covering, and on seeing the genuine Oriental face behind it, shrieks and drops in a faint. The indignant Sultana orders her removal from the ship. She is put off and as the steamer sails, Bunny mockingly waves his hand to the raging Euphemia on the dock. The first day out, he meets Daisy, but she turns coldly away when he seizes her hand. After explanations, and a second proposal of marriage, she turns to him with a smile and says yes. He puts his arm around her and kisses her and Daisy, now fully reconciled, ardently returns her lover's embrace.

THE ANTIQUE ENGAGEMENT RING (Special—2 parts—May 9).—George Darrel presents Helen Gray, his fiancee, with a very valuable engagement ring of antique design, which is an heirloom. They have a serious quarrel over Dave Brower, one of her friends, and Darrel leaves for the West. Later, Helen, giving up all hope of his ever returning, marries Brower, who has persistently courted her. After their marriage, he goes back to his gay life and boon companions, going the pace that kills. He robs his employers, is discovered and appeals to Helen to help him out. She decides to sell Darrel's engagement ring which is still in her possession. Darrel comes East, looking for financial backing to continue the mining project in which he is interested.

Darrel tries in vain to raise the necessary funds. Helen learns of his hopeless efforts, also that her husband is unfaithful to her. She then determines to help Darrel, pawns the ring and sends him the money anonymously. When she accuses Brower of his treachery, he ignores her approaches and asks for money. She defies him, saying, "I raised the money, but you'll never get it!" He angrily throws her to the floor, where she lays unconscious. Thinking he has killed her, he ends his life. Darrel goes West and prospers. He learns that the antique ring is to be sold at auction and returns East to buy it. Helen also goes to the sale, unknown, and later saves him from being robbed. He discovers the whereabouts of his benefactor, but she refuses to see him. They agree to marry after he promises not to look upon her face until they are man and wife. After the wedding, he learns her identity and both are overjoyed, feeling they owe their reunion to the quaint old ring.

MELIES.

BOBBY AS A GUARDIAN ANGEL (April 20).—This is a very interesting little comedy, wherein Bobby's father receives an invitation to dine out with his friends. Bobby knows that his mother objects to his father's outing; so by auto suggestion, he persuades his father that his (the father's) head is swelling visibly, and that he looks as ill as can be. The mother comes in and supports Bobby's contention. Bobby, who has padded his father's hat, gets him to try it on, and needless to say, it does not fit. Much delay is thus brought about, until the father is too late for the appointment. Meanwhile, the doctor is called in, who laughs at the father and says he is quite well. Then Bobby takes the padding out of the hat, and the hat fits. The father then realizes, to his disgust, the practical joke that has been played upon him, but the domestic peace is thus maintained.

HANDSOME HARRY MINDS THE SHOP (April 20).—Handsome Harry chaffs his friend Daly, a jeweller, about the ease with which jewellers might be robbed. He suggests that jewellers were not the sharpest people in the world and it was not very difficult to take them in. Daly asks Oscar to take his place in the shop for a week, which he consents to do. The first day, Daly disguised as a customer, succeeds in robbing Handsome Harry of a diamond pendant and the latter is made to look very foolish. Handsome Harry swears that never again will he laugh at the misfortunes of other people.

BATTY BILL'S BUSTLE MAKES EVERYONE HUSTLE (April 23).—Batty Bill has been left a legacy, but the cruel donor stipulated that it should not be given to him for twenty years. Poor Batty, besieged as ever by creditors, is in a great state of mind and is forced to his utmost resources to find a means of releasing this legacy. In his town all clocks are controlled by electricity from the local observatory, and he thinks of a brilliant idea, of breaking into this place one night, tampering with the arrangements and setting the clocks at a great pace. This is a very amusing picture, because the clocks begin to move at a tremendous speed. Automobiles go at an incredulous pace. Shoppers shop and are served almost before they get into the door. Walkers seem to be racing for dear life, and, in fact, the whole city is on a great hustle. Boys become men and young men grow beards, and in the space of about twenty-four hours, twenty years have passed. Batty Bill secures his fortune.

WINKY WILLY AND THE CHERRIES (April 23).—Winky Willy visits a cherry garden and steals some cherries. He is chased by the owner and compelled to leave a portion of his pants hanging on to the railings. His parents meditated severe punishment. Winky Willy strewed some cherries in the way and bolted. Father and mother could not resist the tempting fruit and Winky escaped quite easily. There still remained the trousers problem. In many respects resembling a scarecrow, Winky Willy remembered that such a guy was doing duty in a neighboring field. Thither he went and fitted himself with the requisite garment. His parents forgot their anger in the delight the vision gave them and all were happy if unscrupulous.

KNOCKABOUT KELLY—A MAGICIAN IN SPITE OF HIMSELF (April 27).—Knockabout Kelly watched a spring discoverer at work and saw a spring brought to light. Waiting an opportunity, he stole the diviner's hazel stick. The theft brought him considerable trouble. Wherever Knockabout went water burst forth. From every part of his bedroom springs burst into activity. He was washed out, and fleeing to a restaurant he twirled the hazel wand to such effect that torrents of water appeared in all directions. So it went on until at length the police appeared and Knockabout was taken to the police station to account for his misdeeds. Here, too, the hazel wand's proclivities were manifest, and the officers had an unexpected bath. Worn out, Knockabout sat down and ruefully gazed upon the magic wand. Thereupon numerous springs gushed from the bed and in the swirl of waters the distracted man disappeared.

BOBBY AND THE BANKER (April 27).—Bobby and the servant are sitting at home, the parents being out, when a telegram arrives, saying that through secret information they are advised that the banker, who has hold of the family securities, is about to run away with the securities. Little Bobby calls on the banker, who is making great haste to pack up the securities before leaving. Bobby then pretends that he has lost his pocketbook in the house and persuades the banker to go out of the room and find it. Meanwhile, Bobby puts a very powerful adhesive to the chair, and the banker returning with the pocketbook, not knowing of the trick, sits on the chair, and is unable to remove himself. Bobby then insults the banker, who chases him out of the house. Just then, a bulldog passing, attacks the banker, who endeavoring to run away with the chair attached, causes interest to be taken in his actions, and Bobby is able to persuade the police to arrest him. He is arrested and charged at the police station. Meanwhile, the police try to pull the chair off his body, but without success, until a hose is brought to play upon him. This is very amusing. Ultimately the chair is freed, and the securities saved.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN TANGOS (April 30).—In this film the Tango is presented as danced in New York, London and Paris. Don't miss the Parisian version.

BATTY BILL, MONKEY AND PELICAN (April 30).—This is a film that will delight the hearts of all children and give great pleasure to all lovers of animals. There is also a flavor of Hans Anderson about it, as we feel that the animals are the real heroes and play the chief part, so that we feel as much sympathy for them as for the immortal "Babes in the Wood."

A COTTAGE BY THE RIVER (May 4).—Lucky was overjoyed when he saw his name down on the lottery result sheet as the winner of a Cottage on the River. His joy, however, was turned to dismay when he learned that the "Cottage on the River" was only the title of a picture. Next time he won a lottery we may be sure that he noticed more carefully what the prize was.

WINKY WILLY'S FIRST CIGAR (May 4).—Winky is on a visit to his aunt, who insists upon his taking a "spring Tonic." To get rid of the bad taste, he tries a cigar which proves too much for him. As sick as he is when questioned he maintains that the "Tonic" was responsible for his illness. But the odor of the cigar still lingers to convict him and Winky Willy gets his.

What Your Paper Says About

The Perils of Pauline

The Perils of Pauline is marked by the unusual in plot, by the reality of settings and scenes and fineness in photography.
—MOTOGRAPHY.

But—and the word is emphasized—as we leave the theatre we plight our solemn promise to the only girl that in two weeks' time we will be occupants of seats in that theatre to see the next episode, even if we have to pay for our seats.
—MOTION PICTURE NEWS.

The Motion Picture Serial has come to stay. The serial story that doesn't get over had better not have been made. By the same token the serial short story that does get over with a real punch is going to be a great moneymaker. The Perils of Pauline is on this account an ideal offering for the exhibitor.
—MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

With the cast no question need be raised as to whether the interpretation of the characters was well done—it was more than well done. The story contains a number of unusual features so intensely interesting that people will come to see the ensuing episodes with their tastes whetted by previous episodes.
—DRAMATIC MIRROR.

In this instalment of the Pauline pictures the connections are well made, the photography is immense and the plot hangs so well that at the New York theatres the pictures have made a big hit.
—VARIETY.

The Perils of Pauline quite fulfils the expectation which was aroused—the situations throughout are tense with suspense. Seldom, if ever, has a more spectacular incident been thrown upon the screen than that depicting the fall of the great Biplane. The staging of this scene is so perfect that it is impossible to believe the accident was not real.

club. He soon had the misfortune to offend a fellow clubman and he was ordered by the president to commit suicide. Poor Batty tried his hardest to obey the president's order, but without success. Finally he decided to marry and live under another name. Several years passed and Batty was living contentedly with his wife when one day she received a note from her uncle saying he would visit her that day. He proved to be the clubman Batty had offended and recognizing the latter he angrily demanded to know why he was not dead. In the end, however, he said he would say no more about it, provided they would give him an heir soon. Since Batty promised, the uncle went away contented. When he came in a year's time Batty determined to be quite safe and so hired all the babies in the neighborhood.

ESSANAY.

THE GREATER LOVE (May 5).—They were poor, terribly poor, yet they loved each other and were only waiting until things turned for the better. Emily had sacrificed her every want to help Rob get on his feet. As a mechanic he worked diligently and was finally promoted to foreman. Adele, his employer's daughter, thought well of him. It was then that he informed Emily that she stood in the way of his progress and he left her, a broken-hearted girl, who had sacrificed what little money and happiness she had for him to marry for social position and wealth.

MAKING HIM OVER—FOR MINNIE (May 6).—Ruth, a young manicurist, is desperately in love with Jimmie White, a mechanic. Ruth's friends make fun of her beau, as he is uneducated both in the matter of clothes and diplomacy. Jimmie comes into some money through a patent and, Ruth with the idea of getting back at her friends, proceeds to make Jimmie over. She even selects the clothes he is to wear, and gets him "all dolled up." Her principal tormentor, Minnie, the beautiful hairdresser, is surprised and captivated at Jimmie's appearance—and determines to win him. She eventually does—but only temporarily. Ruth shows White the error of his ways and he begs forgiveness. She takes him back and all ends happily.

A SNAKEVILLE EPIDEMIC (May 7).—Sophie Clutts is taken with cramps. She becomes abusive to her husband, Slippery Slim. Maud, the mule, is also taken with cramps. Zeke, a farm hand, is sent for the doctors. They arrive hastily and attend their patients. The next day, Sophie and the mule become worse, and Zeke is sent for more medicine. He makes a mistake and gives Sophie the mule's medicine and the mule Sophie's medicine. Then things happen. There is a laugh in every scene.

BRONCHO BILLY'S SERMON (May 9).—Broncho Billy is a typical bad man. The story opens with him shooting up a small town in the West, and scaring the inhabitants nearly to death. The sheriff with his deputies order him out of the country. Sunday morning, the congregation is in church singing. Boardman, another bad man, and his proteges, break up the meeting. The preacher is ousted. The members of the congregation write a letter to a neighboring minister, to come and preach the following Sunday. The bad men read the letter and determine to stop him before he reaches town, which they do. Broncho Billy sees the preacher and determines to take his place, and so it is that he leads the bad men into church, makes them doff their hats and listen to the sermon. He proves himself a man and determines to be good himself, hereafter.

THE MYSTERY OF ROOM 643 (Special—2 parts—May 8).—During one of his visits to Mr. Hamilton's home, after the rescue of Judith, Hamilton's daughter, and the recovery of the priceless scarab, which was all told in "In the Moon's Ray," Richard Neal, private investigator of crime, meets Milton Wade. He learns that the two young people are engaged and it is with a touch of disappointment—for perhaps—who knows?—he had cherished the idea that perhaps some day he might care for Judith himself. The next morning Neal receives an urgent message from Mr. Hamilton. Certain papers that he must have, have mysteriously disappeared from the safe, which was guarded by a secret alarm. Hamilton alone knew the combination. It is indeed a mystery. Not so to Neal, however. By a simple deduction he solves the mystery of the disappearance almost immediately. He gives Mr. Hamilton an envelope, telling him to lock it in the safe. This is done. Neal leaves, but when he returns a few moments later and asks Mr. Hamilton to open the safe, the latter's surprise is genuine, as the envelope has disappeared. This the detective hands to Hamilton. Neal has now discovered the way the valuable papers disappeared. Now to find the thief.

Neal has decided that the only man who could have an interest in the papers is Blackburn, the man whom they concern. He visits Blackburn in the guise of a reporter, and while there, gets possession of the valuable paper which he knew was on his person. The note was to the effect that Blackburn was to call that night at a certain place if interested and to "bring the check book." At Hamilton's office, Judith unknowingly gives Neal the final link in his chain of evidence against Wade. At the typewriter, Judith playfully pounds out a few words. The "e's" are clogged. This is funny, because the "e's" in the note Neal took from Blackburn's pocket are in the same condition. Neal suspects Wade and tells Hamilton so. The private investigator of crime tells Hamilton he will bring the guilty one to his office at eight o'clock, and, true to his word, he captures Wade in a lowly dive where he had gone to meet Blackburn. The thief is taken to Hamilton's office, where Judith learns the terrible truth. She pleads with the detective to let him go, that her father will not appear against him, and he does. Hamilton thanks the shrewd detective and wishes that his daughter were in love with him—but who knows, perhaps Fate may bring the two together again—and undoubtedly it will.

PROFESSOR SPUFF'S ROMANCE (April 27).—By the law of nature it is natural that Professor Spuff, weighing in the neighborhood of 330 pounds, should love and be loved by Angelica Sweet, weighing 90 pounds when wearing a heavy coat. But Nature made a mistake when she made the Professor subject to periodical somnambulism.

Angelica is a teacher in a girl's seminary of which Professor Spuff is president. Professor Spuff, asleep at his residence, suddenly rises from his bed without waking. Clad in his nightie and with his eyes closed he marches across the snow-covered college campus. His sub-conscious state leads him through the girl's dormitory to the room wherein Angelica Sweet is sweetly sleeping.

Angelica's scream of fright brings the fat professor out of his trance. He makes a break for the door. Angelica, fearing scandal, begs him to go forth unobserved. They decide to use the window. Making a rope of the bed clothes, Spuff gets out. At the end of the rope the college watch dog awaits his. Spuff climbs back.

The only other avenue of escape is by shipping him home in a trunk. The next morning an expressman carts the professor away. Spuff gets home unobserved, but he doesn't arrive in a trunk, that's the funniest part of it.

THE DEADLIEST OF NATURE'S CELEBRITIES (April 28).—Everyone has heard of the cobra, but few persons would know one if they saw it. This film will correct such a deficiency in the knowledge of all those who are fortunate enough to see it. The cobra is commonest in India, where its dreaded sting is fatal to 20,000 humans every year. After various views showing the poisonous fangs and teeth of the cobra a scene is taken in which the cobra strikes at the camera. No man stood the camera at the time, a motor drive being used, and luckily, for the instrument was found to be sprinkled with tiny dots of deadly venom after the serpent struck.

A FEW MINUTES IN CALCUTTA (INDIA) (April 28).—A visit to the habitat of the cobra, showing the tropical foliage which helps obscure the creeping menace. The film is in natural color.

IN ROYAL BONDAGE (Special—2 parts—April 30).—Prince George of Vavania, while hunting on the royal preserve with his elder brother, the Crown Prince, meets the gamekeeper's daughter, Rosa. The first meeting leaves Prince George deeply affected. On subsequent occasions the contrast between the hauteur of the Court Ladies and Rosa's lack of affectation captivates Prince George, filling his heart with a wild love for the gamekeeper's daughter.

Meanwhile, the King of Bavania has planned for his son, George, a brilliant marriage with a lady of rank and he so informs the young man. Prince George refuses to be bound by his father's desires and spurred on by this activity on the part of his parent, George meets Rose and secretly they are married. For three years this couple who have defied the rule of rank abide in an unbounden love and feel that they are immune from its penalties.

But Prince George's brother dies suddenly. By this event George becomes Crown Prince and his life is no longer his own, but belongs to his country. The emperor informs the new Crown Prince that it is his duty to marry that the Kingdom of Bavania may have an heir. George informs his father that he is married. The old king is astonished. He commands his son to do his bidding; he storms and rages and threatens, but to no avail. Finally the aged ruler pleads so eloquently with his son that "duty" takes on a new importance to the Crown Prince. It burns itself into his heart and its luster dims and obliterates the word "love." Reluctantly the Crown Prince consents. He visits the wife of his heart and explains the situation to her. She bows before the Royal edict which takes love out of her life and in return gives her the title "Baroness."

The date for the royal wedding is set and although as the days progress it grows more and more repellent to him, the crown prince steels himself by repeating over and over again the word "duty." On the day of the ceremony Prince George looking out across the palace grounds sees at a point of vantage his wife and his little boy. His heart sickens. Fury and loathing at the slavery of royal blood succeed one another. He hurries out of the palace and runs to where Rosa and her child are watching. Once more, if only for a few moments, he is his own master. In wild embrace he clasps the woman and child he loves. No word is spoken, for words are inadequate. They dare not trust

THE ACCUSING EYE (Special—2 parts—May 2).—The satisfaction of outraged justice is always an engrossing pursuit. With this fact established there is no need to question the success of this film for the power provided by the plot and the acting of the players will hold the interest of the most elusive audience. Fred Bruce, secretary to an ambassador, having met with an accident while sailing in his boat, is helpless in the sea and in danger of drowning, when his plight is discovered by Emma Reynolds. Without a moment's hesitation Emma dives overboard and after a courageous struggle brings the limp body of Fred Bruce to shore.

The acquaintance thus formed ripens into a mutual love and Fred and Emma become engaged. Fred's bliss is short-lived, however, for the ambassador, too, falls in love with Emma. But the girl repulses him. Enraged, the ambassador discharges his secretary. This is the first of a series of misfortunes that in a short time become so overpowering that the girl finds peace in a watery grave. Hearing of this the already overwrought mind of Fred Bruce gives way under the strain and his violence compels the authorities to incarcerate him in an insane asylum.

But the asylum keepers credit too slightly Fred's ingenuity and in a short time he makes his escape. He has but one purpose in mind and that purpose, vengeance. Wandering about, Bruce peers into the face of each passer-by apparently seeing nothing until at last he meets the eyes he seeks.

The ambassador is dining with his fiancee at a fashionable restaurant when the staring, venemous eyes of the unfortunate man first startle him. From that day onward he has no peace. Wherever he goes he faces the accusing eye. It even haunts him in his dreams. One day the official with his fiancee prepares for a sail and their spirits soar when for a brief spell they are not hounded by the man the ambassador has wronged.

But they are not far off shore when Bruce appears at the dock they have left. He boards a tug. The captain opposes him, but is no match for Bruce, now possessed of the excessive strength of a madman. With uncanny determination and skill he pursues the slow-moving sailboat. The occupants of the little craft suspect nothing until the tug bears down upon them. They see the accusing eye and the next moment, the crash. As he watches the ambassador and his bride-to-be sink for the last time, he retraces his course, and for the first time, he smiles.

THE MAN HIGHER UP (May 4).—The man higher up is the most elusive guy in the world. Ask any political reformer. He has been sought for years, but it remained for J. R. Bray, the well-known cartoonist, to see the possibilities of fun in the pursuit. In this case the Man Higher Up is awakened by the yelping of a dog. Having chased the cur, the Man Higher Up cannot sleep again. Also he is terribly thirsty, but absolutely broke. A ray of hope comes to him when he sees Smith, who lives in the flat below returning with a pitcher of beer. The object of the Man Higher Up now is to get some of that beer. A brace and bit and the rubber gas tube solve the problem. But in a little while Smith discovers his loss. He discovers the reason for it, too, and gets square by means of a bellows which he attaches to the tube that carries the beer to the Man Higher Up. The result is as funny a scene as can be conceived.

MANILA, CAPITAL OF THE PHILIPPINES (May 4).—This little town has flourished under American protection, as will be noticed by the trolley lines, a thing unthought of twenty years ago. The natives, too, have become infected with industry and even the boys are at work in the streets, selling Hang-Hang flowers. An electric bridge is another of the many evidences of the surprising development of these American islands.

MAX, THE LADY KILLER (May 5).—Max rebukes his young nephew for failing in his studies and the boy decides to get even. When the opportunity presents itself the youngster pins a note on Max's back. The message has a queer effect, as every woman, young and old, after reading it, tries her best to kiss the charming Max. For once the heartbreaker has had enough. He seeks safety in flight. But having stolen their hearts Max is pursued by the girls who only halt when the lady killer hurries into the house of his sweetheart. Here the note on his back saves Max the trouble and embarrassment of proposing, for his fiancee believes the note to be a ruse of Max's to cover his bashfulness.

A WINTER EXCURSION TO THE FALLS OF TANNFORSEN, SWEDEN (May 5).—A journey through the land of ice and snow where sleighing and daring skiing are year-round sports, culminating with a visit to Tannforsen Falls, the Niagara of Sweden.

A MEDDLER WITH FATE (Special—2 parts—May 7).—Captain Anderson, while enjoying a furlough from his military duties suddenly receives a summons that requires his absence from home for a few days. The interruption is unpleasant to the little family of wife and child, for no other company to them is quite so dear as that of husband and father. The day following the captain's departure his wife receives an unexpected call from an old schoolmate. As may well be imagined the conversation naturally drifts to the good old school days when they were care-free girls together. During the visit the two ladies go for a walk, upon which they chance to meet two young men, whom they have known from former days and who are about to inspect a country home they had recently purchased together. The ladies are induced to accompany them. Arriving at the estate the merry four enjoy the beautiful surroundings, happy in the recollections of days gone by. The captain's wife with her companion, become separated from the other couple and stroll about the grounds in the lovely paths protected by the luxurious foliage and leading to resting-places peculiarly attractive to romantic souls. The youth seems to charm the girl or else she forgets her marital responsibility, at any rate the man's embraces do not seem to be repulsive to her.

At this stage two boys in a neighboring house seeking a subject upon which to experiment their photographic art, snap a picture of the couple thus engaged. The captain soon returns from his trip and again enjoys the pleasures of his home and ease. Not so his wife, for she has become quickened with the romance the old friendship affords and plans to meet her companion again at the same place at a favorable opportunity.

The Captain's favorite pastime, a walk with his dog, fatally leads him before the house in which live the small boys. Their cherished picture is exposed to the sun in the making of a print, but the dog accidentally knocks the negative down and the Captain recognizes the subject. When his wife later suggests her spending the afternoon with a friend the Captain's surprise is not spontaneous, for he fears as much and plans to get the startling evidence himself.

Following his wife in his motor car he sees her enter the grounds of her friend. With his camera he enters the boys' home from which he snaps his wife in the encircling arms of her companion. His fears confirmed, but none the less painful, the husband retreats to his home where he hesitates between love and duty. His fight is hard, but he means to make his erring wife suffer as he. Under the excuses of a sudden call elsewhere he leaves word for his wife to develop the picture he has taken, promising to return in a few hours. Upon her arrival home the wife fearlessly goes about the task, but imagine her consternation when she discovers the evidence she is helping to pull about her. Remorse comes, but comes too late for the husband's wrath is beyond her wiles. Penitence avails nothing, the protection of their child does not relieve the situation. In pleading for forgiveness the mother swears her love for her home. In his wrath the man goes to his own room, but his wife refuses to leave, stating she would rather die. The husband accepts this course as the only proof of her complete repentence and the woman determines to end it thus.

The husband, however, finally relents and attempts to prevent the woman in her purpose. Almost too late he catches her as she is about to throw herself before an approaching train. The determination to prove her regard for the loved ones wins forgiveness for her and the effect of her meddling with fate results in a household again happily united.

THE MARRIAGE OF CUPID (Special—2 parts—May 9).—Psyche, the daughter of a king, and a mortal, is so beautiful that even the God of Fame is fascinated by her charm. He hurries to tell Venus, Goddess of Beauty, that her loveliness is surpassed by a mortal. The jealousy of Venus is aroused and she orders her son, Cupid, the God of Love, to avenge the indignity. One glance at Psyche and Cupid revolts. He beseeches his mother to relent, but Venus is deaf to his pleading and swears to destroy her rival's powers.

While joy reigns in the court of Psyche's father, Venus strikes at Psyche by inflicting an illness upon the king. His malady baffles all, and in desperation the queen consults the oracle. The oracle decrees that when Psyche marries a mortal her father will be saved. However, Psyche's husband will be a monster who will devour her. Psyche consents to the sacrifice and is bound to a tree on a mountain top where she is left to await the prophesied husband, but Cupid finding her, braves the anger of his mother, and with the aid of Zephyr, God of the Winds, and Morpheus, God of Sleep, he sets her free.

Cupid confesses to Psyche that he loves her, but must be kept hidden from her gaze since he is a God and she is only a mortal. Psyche agrees to this arrangement and with Cupid she lives in perfect contentment, until the visit of her sisters. They persuade Psyche that her husband must be the monster predicted by the oracle. Psyche is overcome by the temptation and finding Cupid asleep and a veil covering his face, she lifts the veil. Immediately Cupid disappears because of Psyche's broken vow.

In the meantime, Venus has sent men to capture her rival and Psyche, wandering on the mountain as a result of her infidelity, falls into their hands. Pardon is offered her provided the girl secures the beauty box from Prosperpine, the Queen of the Underworld. Psyche starts on her mission. Charon succumbs to her beauty and consents to take her over the River Styx. Her trip is successful and Psyche returns with the treasure. Venus now assured of her superiority, makes Psyche immortal and permits her marriage with Cupid.

GEORGE KLEINE.

THE BROKEN CHAIN (Cines—Special—2 parts—May 5).—Helen Reynolds, an heiress, finds life a great bore in spite of the adoration of her many suitors, because among them all there is no one who is able to inspire in her heart the love she longs to give. At last, however, she becomes acquainted with a poor artist by the name of Vargas, with whom she falls deeply in love and who, boring to mend his fortunes by means of a rich marriage, pretends to be infatuated with her. Springtime finds them on their honeymoon.

Vargas is entirely mercenary and absolutely selfish and heartless, incapable of a deep, abiding affection. After he has dissipated the greater part of her fortune through riotous living, Helen finds her husbands love less ardent. He then succeeds in fascinating Mrs. Freeman, a rich widow, and in order to marry her, forces Helen, by continued cruelty, to secure a divorce. He leaves her heartbroken, and although she presents a brave face to the world, she spends many tearful hours, alone and inconsolable.

She seeks forgetfulness at the seaside and there becomes great friends with pretty Dorothy Clarke, a seventeen-year-old girl who, she afterward learns, is the niece of Mrs. Freeman, now the fiancee of Vargas. The artist, upon meeting Dorothy, is smitten with her native charm and exerts all his powers of fascination to win her love. He finally succeeds, but Helen learns of his plans and to save the girl from his wiles, tells her own sad story. The child's love for the artist quickly turns to contempt.

Vargas learns that his failure to win the heiress is due to the activities of his former wife and upbraids her villainously, threatening her, and ending his tirade with "Must you always be a chain upon my life and actions?" The next day he is horrified to step into the room adjoining his own and there to find the body of Helen lying lifeless at his feet. The chain is broken.

THE TOREADOR'S ROMANCE (Cines—Special—2 parts—May 12).—Jose, a cattle herder on a Spanish "rancho," is deeply in love with pretty Rosita, the village coquette, and when he finds her engaging in a flirtation with the son of his employer, he loses his head and starts a quarrel with the young man, which leads to his dismissal. Soon afterward the ranchman sends young Santos to a near-by town with a large sum of money to deposit in the bank. He is set upon by a band of murderous mountaineers, robbed and left dead by the roadside. Because of his recent quarrel with the youth, Jose is suspected and placed under arrest.

One of the robbers, however, angry because he feels he has not been given his fair share of the spoils, informs the police and after an exciting battle in the foot-hills, the bandits are captured and Jose exonerated. He is then befriended by a rich manufacturer who gives him money to leave for a distant city, there to start life anew. A year later we find Jose the idol of the populace of Seville and the most skillful toreador in Spain. His benefactor has married in the meantime and one day when he and his bride are attending the bull fight, he is astonished to recognize in the famous toreador his old protege, Jose. The friendship is renewed and Jose becomes a frequent visitor at the manufacturer's mansion.

Between Jose and the young wife an intimate friendship springs up which grows stronger and stronger until gradually the jealousy of the husband is aroused. Jose, seeing that he really is falling in love and realizing that he is on the verge of destroying the happiness of his friend, writes him a note to the effect that he is going away. That afternoon the great crowd at the bull fight is horrified to see the great toreador trampled and gored by the hoofs and horns of the infuriated bull.

A BLIND BUSINESS (May 5).—Humpty and Rags, two happy hoboes, are thrown off a freight train by a brakeman. Hungry, they stroll through the park and come across a blind man, to whom Rags gives his last penny for good luck. While sitting on a bench to rest, they notice the thriving business the blind man is doing and decide to try the same business themselves. Stealing a scarecrow from a farm they return to the park and steal the blind man's sign and tin cup (while he is asleep). They rig up the dummy and set him on a bench. Pedestrians passing by pour money into the cup and the hoboes see visions of a banquet. But their dreams are shattered when the blind man, who is only a fake, wakes up and misses his sign and tin cup. Then begins a merry chase. The hoboes are caught and dragged to a pond for a bath, while the blind man is arrested for being a fraud.

CASEY'S BIRTHDAY (May 5).—Daniel Casey refuses to work because it is his birthday. He quits his job and starts off to celebrate. Mrs. Casey has prepared a surprise party and to make sure that Casey will come home sober she sends his friend, Dooley, out to get him. After visiting a number of saloons, Dooley finally finds Casey very drunk. Dooley gets him partly sober and then starts him for the Casey home.

The guests arrive and plan to surprise Casey by turning down the lights. Dooley leads Casey into the house, the lights are suddenly turned up, and at first Casey mistakes them for burglars and starts to fight. He is quieted and all proceed to make merry. Mrs. Kransemier, who has the rooms over Casey's, thinks there is a riot and she telephones for the police. While the Irishmen are having a good time the police arrive and attempt to stop the noise, but the Irishmen throw them out of the window. The reserves are called out and another attempt is made to break up the party, but Casey tosses a keg of beer to the police and they forget all about duty. The guests are called to eat. Mrs. Casey has baked a cake which bears the inscription "Papa." One of the Irishmen for a joke removes the letter "P," leaving "APA." Casey sees this, goes wild, cleans up the party and chases the guests. Monarch of all he surveys, Casey takes the floor for a bed, wraps himself in a rug and falls asleep.

BEHIND THE FOOTLIGHTS (Special—2 parts—May 6).—Violet Dale obtains, through the intervention of Stanley Hilton, a wealthy idler, a small part in a new musical comedy. Frank Gordon, the house electrician, loses his heart to Violet, but his diffidence keeps him silent. Hilton's interest in Violet is only casual, his particular flame being Clara Delane, the star. Clara is hurt during the first performance, and it is found that no one has been instructed to understudy her part. Violet volunteers to play it, and makes a small hit. Hilton begins to pay her ardent attentions. One night Violet becomes frightened, and to avoid a meeting with Hilton remains late in her dressing-room. Gordon and the watchman are the only others in the building.

Fire breaks out and Violet, unconscious, is carried out by Gordon, who puts her in Hilton's arms when he meets him at the stage door, and re-enters the burning structure to rescue the watchman. The newspapers give an account of Violet's rescue "by Mr. Hilton," and she, having been unconscious, assumes this to be true. It does not occur to Gordon to contradict the report. Violet being out of Hilton's sight, his interest in her now wanes. Violet's illness outlasts her slender purse, but she is told by the hospital authorities that an anonymous friend is paying all expenses. She thinks this friend must be Hilton, and that she is under terrible obligations to him. Each day there comes a bunch of violets, accompanied sometimes by a little unsigned note of cheer. The bills have really been paid by Gordon, and it is he who sends the violets and messages. Upon Violet's return to the theater, Hilton, who has quarreled with Clara, sees that she gets her position again, and begins to shower her with attentions. Feeling that she owes him her life and her hospital treatment, Violet finds it almost impossible to resist his advances. On the night of the last performance, she finds in her dressing-room a note from Hilton, telling her that if her answer is "yes" to his demands, she is to wear the roses he has sent. She also discovers a little bunch of wild violets with an unsigned note which tells her that they are few because they are the last in all the fields. Violet is amazed—the writing on this note, entirely different from Hilton's, is the same hand as the notes which reached her at the hospital.

Gordon has learned of Hilton's note, and is desperate at last. He steals into Hilton's box, unobserved, determined to kill him if the girl wears the roses. When she appears, she wears the violets. Later Violet identifies the unsigned note as being Gordon's handwriting, and also learns that it was he who saved her from the fire. There is a sudden awakening in her heart, and when she finds Gordon on the deserted stage, she goes to him.

WHEN CONSCIENCE CALLS (Special—2 parts—May 7).—Hilary and his wife, Edith, are in well-to-do circumstances, but they deprive themselves of pleasure to get together a bank account that will enable them to purchase a little ranch bungalow they have pictured. Hilary meets an old friend, Fred Miller, a successful and rich business man. He wins Hilary's envy with tales of his money-making and success. Hilary's faith in him is boundless and in an impulsive moment tells of his savings and future hopes. Miller smothers his quick interest, makes much of Hilary, who invites him home to dinner. There Miller meets and becomes infatuated with Edith. He tells of a stock promotion in which they can secure quick and splendid returns. Edith wants to hold back awhile, but Hilary wins her over and the next day pays over his hard earned savings and takes the gold-edged certificates in return.

A week later Miller goes into bankruptcy. The news is heart-breaking, but Edith's sympathy and resignation relieves Hilary for the moment. Later it begins to rankle and he goes to Miller's house one night. Through the window he sees Miller open a secret compartment in his desk and take out bundles of money. He enters by way of the window and facing Miller demands what is his. Miller laughs at him, there is a fight and Miller hits the floor. Hilary, thinking he has killed him, hurriedly counts out the amount of money Miller took from him and hastens home. He tells Edith he has killed Miller and gives her the money to hide. They escape to the Everglades. Miller regains consciousness, replaces the balance of the money and sends for the police. They take up the trail, after searching Hilary's home, and for days Hilary is hunted like a wild beast in the Everglade jungle. Edith and the house are watched night and day until she can stand it no longer and, taking the money, goes to see Miller. She asks him if he will give up the search if the money is returned. He bluffs her until she shows the money, then forcibly takes it from her. She begs him to let Hilary go free, now that he has the money, and he, in answer, tells her he has wanted her for a long while, and makes her the final price. Horrified, she flees after a struggle and goes home. Hilary meanwhile has been stricken with fever and is calling for his wife in his delirium. Edith has a vision of Hilary calling and in the depth of night she goes in search of him. She is followed, however, and when ultimately her instinct leads her to her husband the detective comes up. She fights him desperately, but is finally subdued and after reviving Hilary they leave the jungle. Miller is stricken with an

A FIVE REEL feature fashioned with common sense, produced by the cleverest men that reasonable capital could secure and based upon the idea that motion pictures can be acted properly only by trained motion picture actors.

The fact that legitimate stars have been disappointments or utter failures in nearly all of the expensive pictures in which they have appeared, proves the soundness of our idea.

The drawing power of the legitimate star is limited to the two dollar class in a few large cities, but the motion picture favorites have a following in every city, town and village, amongst the classes whose nickels and dimes make motion pictures possible.

"The Littlest Rebel" was one of the most successful war dramas ever written. As a photoplay it will surpass any production of its kind thus far attempted.

illness which the doctors tell him is mortal and when Hilary, a few days later, is brought before him for identification, Miller emphatically declares Hilary is innocent and that he was mistaken. The police do not want to believe him, but there is nothing to be done and he is released. Miller makes it up to Hilary and the other creditors, and gets well. Later we see him visiting Hilary and Edith on their little ranch where he is readily forgiven.

VENGEANCE IS MINE (May 8).—John Wilkes, prospector, returns from his day's labor and begins to prepare his evening meal. He is interrupted by sounds, and upon investigating finds a small band of Yaquis engaged in an attack upon another lone prospector. He rushes to the man's aid and the two succeed in repulsing the Indians and in gaining John's cabin. Here John finds that the man has been seriously wounded, and gives such crude medical aid as is at his command. He then returns to the scene of the fight to retrieve the stranger's pack. He picks it up and notices a letter which has fallen from it. He reads it and discovers that the prospector is none other than his own foster-brother whom he has been unable to recognize on account of the change in features brought about by time. In a dissolving scene it is registered that his brother has, at a time ten years previous, committed the crime of killing John's father and then by a clever ruse fastening the crime upon the innocent John. For this John is sent to prison for life, but manages to escape and make his way to his old home, which he finds in the hands of strangers. He seeks for his mother and finds her grave. Here the illusion ends and he realizes that at last he has the real criminal in his power and is at liberty to wreak fitting vengeance upon him. To redress to his cabin, he throws his record in and enters, only to find that the foster-brother has died in his absence bearing out the old quotation, "Vengeance Is Mine."

WITH THE BURGLAR'S HELP (May 9).—Jones, an inveterate poker player, is a continual source of worry to his wife on account of the late hours he keeps and the condition in which he comes home. He enters one morning in the wee small hours, assisted by a taxi chauffeur. Wifey has been waiting for him with a club, and before he has a chance to explain, she beats up the chauffeur, thinking he is the cause of her husband's condition. The following day Jones tells his wife that he shall be detained at the office. The boys at the club are shy one man for the game; they telephone for Jones, who quickly accepts. One a. m. and Jonesy has not returned. Wifey calls up the office, but is unable to get an answer. She then calls up the club, but is told her husband has gone home. She decides to wait until he comes in. Jonesy dashes out of the club and tries to get the same chauffeur to take him home, but he remembers the last trip and fires Jones out of the car. Arriving in front of his home, after a long walk, Jones sees a burglar trying keys in the door. Mrs. Jones is waiting in the hall. When the burglar opens the door she hits him over the head and knocks him unconscious, thinking it is her husband. But she is horrified when the door opens again and Jones walks into the hall. Thinking of a scheme to terrorize his wife, Jones makes her think she has killed the burglar; she faints and he drags her into another room, where he leaves her while he returns to the ball to revive the burglar and gives him some money and lets him beat it. Then going back to his wife, she in terror, falls on her knees, and he tells her that he has buried the body and that he will always keep her secret, providing he may come and go as he pleases.

BUILDING A FIRE (May 9).—Maggie, the cook in the Jones family, likes to sleep late. She kills the alarm clock for disturbing her sleep and further when Mrs. Jones comes to her room to find out why she does not get up, Maggie fakes it by telling her she is sick. Mr. Jones, who is a salesman, has a very important appointment and to keep it has to catch the eight o'clock train. As Maggie is still in bed he undertakes to build the fire himself and in his attempt causes an explosion by using kerosene. Maggie at last appears on the scene only to pour more oil on the fire. The Jones are sure she is going to set the place afire and they rush out to inform the police and fire departments. However, when the firemen appear the kitchen is in perfect order and there is a likely set breakfast table. The ready firemen in their wrath angrily turn the fire extinguishers on to the Joneses.

SELIG.

THE SCHOOLING OF MARY ANN (April 28).—Mary Ann is a simple country girl, and has ambitions that a farm does not furnish. She hopes to go to the Seminary, but her crusty old father, Ephraim Hardy, thinks it too costly, and her mother does not see any good in such schools, anyhow. One day good news comes to her. A wealthy uncle in San Francisco writes he wants his niece educated in a fashionable Coast seminary, and encloses his check to cover the expenses. At this Mary Ann's delight is pathetic. She packs up all her belongings and arrayed in her old-fashioned clothes, goes tremblingly away on her great adventure. She is a very quaint and funny feature at the school the girls laugh at her and she finds herself isolated.

Finally one of the proudest and most popular girls, strong and sympathetic, determines to relieve Mary Ann of her misery and "bring her out." She borrows some gowns from other girls, arrays her in proper fashion, and instructs her in matters of etiquette, enlisting the aid of one of the young men who frequents the seminary sociables. Mary Ann falls in love with this young man (Robert Jackson) and he reciprocates her affection; but she cannot bear the thought of his knowing from what lowly people she has sprung. When she leaves school at the spring vacation for home she does not give him her address or further encouragement. Fate has ordained it otherwise, for although Mary had her brief flight of joyous ambition, she returns to the duty of driving cows and washing dishes. Eventually, through an automobile mishap, the dapper young fellow finds her at work; so he claims her for his own, in spite of her seedy old father and her countried mother.

THE PIRATES OF PEACOCK ALLEY (April 29).—Peacock Alley is an imaginary city, but its inhabitants are familiar to all. Here dwells Divorcee (the Heart Pirate), unable to pay her bills. Here also is Remittance Man (a Marriage Pirate), equally unable to meet demands; and the two meet and greet in Peacock Alley, plotting to introduce each other to wealthy Widower and Rich Girl, the end and aim of their existence being pleasure and possession of money to promote their plans. Willful Daughter, who is the Rich Girl, is forbidden by her parents to even read about Peacock Alley; but bored by these restrictions, she steals away there, and likewise there goes the Lonely Widower. There the pirates find their prey and there, in the shadows of the palm room, they plot.

Another cheap and flashing figure is Candy Dolly, a salesgirl, who haunts Peacock Alley, waiting for the man with the dinner. There comes also Discontented Wife, who craves finery. They meet Gray Wolf (the man of the dinner) and Fox, who haunts the trail of the Gray Wolf. Having wined and dined some weeks later, Gray Wolf gives Divorcee bogus stock to sell to Widower, and Fox gives some of the same stock to Discontented Wife, promising large dividends. The next rush scene in this eventful history is Willful Daughter marrying the Remittance Man, which precipitates a train of trouble all along the line. All these deceiving and deceived people begin to find each other out. Finally tragedy ends the useless life of the Remittance Man, the Willful Daughter sees the errors of her ways, returns home and is forgiven, while the surviving pirates are fortunately left in prison awaiting trial.

LITTLE MISS BOUNTIFUL (April 30).—Little Charity, a girl of five, goes to the bank with her father, observes him drawing a check and receiving money from the teller. She is puzzled, but concludes that is the easiest way to get money. She pushes the teller a blank check, and he, receiving a signal from her father to honor it, pays out a few coins, and the child thanks him politely, as the father secretly refunds the bank the amount donated. Delighted over the fact that she now knows how to get all the money she wants to help poor people, Charity goes home, puts the coins in her toy bank, and confides in her father and mother her plans for doing good. They humor her and commend her generosity, little dreaming just how far it may reach.

She secretly starts out on her mission of philanthropy, only to soon find her bank empty. Returning, however, by depositing a "check" in it, which is seen by her mother, who cashes it, she finds she has another supply to continue her good work. The small army of beggars, tramps, newsboys and organ-grinders soon spread the news of her visits, and a clamoring crowd of mendicants awaits her. Of course her resources are quickly exhausted. She cannot argue with them and is at a loss to explain, so she seizes and hangs about her neck a sign worn by a street urchin, which reads, "I am blind," and marches home. Her family, who has gone in search of her, see the situation, and trust that the lesson received will work for good.

A KNIGHT OF TROUBLE (May 1).—William Jenkins loves Bedelia Stubbs, but has been forbidden the house. He dares her father's anger, however, and is visiting Bedelia in the library, which is decorated with various war trophies, including suits of armor, when they hear old man Stubbs stumping through the hall. Jenkins has no chance to escape, so he climbs into the armor by the fireplace. Stubbs has in tow old Brown, whom he designs as a marriageable mate for his daughter. The girl is called away and the old men have several glasses of wine, which warms them up right merrily. Stubbs is called to the telephone, and Brown, slightly tipsy, staggers up to examine the armor. Jenkins bowls him over, and rushes from the room clattering and colliding with Stubbs at the door. He flies through the door, surprising the cook and "her policeman," rushes down the street, and finally seeks refuge in a Spiritualist seance that detectives have arranged to raid. The police grab him for a fake spirit, and he is carried away in a patrol wagon. Jenkins explains how he came into the rusty armor and they drive him back to old Stubbs' house, where he admits everything. The old man is a better and is so delighted to learn how Jenkins pursued her, known that he forgives him and blesses the alliance with Jenkins, who is a knight in spite of himself.

THE PLOT THAT FAILED (May 1).—Mr. Newlywed mistakes his mother-in-law for the new cook, and plans to make the stay of his prospective relative visitor miserable and unhappy. The old lady falls in with the plans and carries out all the tricks suggested, which are numerous and amusing. When the real cook appears on the scene, hubby discovers his mistake and "roasts" out on the back fence until wifey calls him in and mother-in-law, who appreciates a joke, forgives him.

MARRYING GRETCHEN (May 5).—Heinie, a Hollander, emigrates to America, and when he hears the foreman of the ranch where he works express longing for a wife, he devises a scheme whereby he secures the transportation of his own sweetheart, Gretchen, by telling the ranchman that she is the very ideal of his dreams. The big ranchman falls for the scheme so easily that Heinie shrewdly looks for further funds, and interests big Bill, a cowpuncher, who also falls for the far-away Dutch Venus. Both Bill and Steve, the foreman, receive letters written in Plattdeutsch, which neither can read, and which the ingenious Heinie translates, telling them that if they will send sufficient money for passage, she will sail immediately. Neither man knows of the other's correspondence, so both "come across" with the necessary funds.

When Gretchen arrives, she is clad in exaggerated Dutch costume, that Bill and Steve immediately desire some way to escape their matrimonial dilemma and naturally fall upon the same route. They get Heinie aside, each separately, and give him another sum of money. While Heinie has been attending to these financial details, another cowboy, of quick impulse and energetic action, Fritz, finds a way to neglected Gretchen's heart, and when the minister comes, responsive to the call of Bill and Steve, Fritz gets hold of him first and marries Gretchen. Then the two ranchmen, learning of the duplicity of the disappointed Heinie, hold him at bay until he makes restoration, while Fritz walks away with Gretchen as his wife.

THE EVIL SHE DID (May 6).—Marie Sanford, the village beauty of a coast village, coquettishly ensnares the hearts of two sons of the sea, Jack and Tom Halsey, sons of the veteran fisherman, Captain Halsey. She manages her campaign so cleverly that she becomes engaged to both boys, neither knowing of the infatuation of the other. As they are returning from a successful fishing trip, speculating upon the profits of their catch, each inadvertently admits the prospects of marriage to Marie Sanford, the village beauty. In a flash, each has an understanding of the intention of the other. Arguments lead to such bitterness that in a fight which ensues the older boy is pushed overboard; the other goes after him, and both are drowned, locked in each other's arms. This double loss so affects the old Captain that he loses his mind, and the fishing company which he has headed sends a new manager to replace him.

This new functionary, William Maitland, coming from a big city, is quite an important personage in the town, and the heartless and forgetful Marie immediately falls in with this new king of the flirty sort, co-operates in demonstrative return. The villagers nudge one another and speak of her escapade under breath, but when she picks up a telegram directed to Maitland, ordering him to return at once, as he is the father of a new baby boy, there is dreadful disillusioning for her, but she has brought it all about by her own foolishness, so that she is left alone to sorrow, without commiseration from those who know of her heartlessness.

TWO GIRLS (May 7).—Grace Tabor and Vera Stokes have been friends since childhood. Mrs. Tabor enters heartily into all her daughter's enjoyments, while Mrs. Stokes is cold and narrow-minded. Mrs. Tabor gives her daughter, Grace, an informal dance, and, of course, the first invitation sent is to Vera; but Mrs. Stokes does not approve of dancing, so poor Vera stays at home and mourns sullenly. Shortly thereafter, Vera's mother observes her at the gate with a young man friend, and humiliates the girl by sharply reproving her and calling her into the house. The inevitable happens. Herbert King, a traveling salesman, meets her on the street; she returns his advances with coquettish glances and meets him clandestinely. The danger line is crossed—the girl is left despairing. She appeals to the man, but he is the conventional cad, goes away and leaves her almost frantic. Vera scrawls a brief note to her mother, and then sneaks away to hide her disgrace. In the meantime, Grace has happily married.

Three years slip by. Grace comes to the crowning event of a woman's life—the gift of a child. Poor Mrs. Tabor realizes too late that the fault was not Vera's alone, and that she is in no small sense responsible for her daughter's downfall. As for Vera, she drifts down, down into the depths. One scene shows Grace and her happy home. The contrast reveals Vera in the back room of a cheap saloon, dejected, worn out, and drowsily asleep. The brutal clean-up man slouches into the room and tells her to move on. She staggers to her feet, and, buttoning her thin wrap about her, goes out into the rainy night, stumbling wearily down the street—Where?

NEW YORK BOSTON PORTLAND SPRINGFIELD NEW HAVEN

THE MOTHER OF SEVEN (May 8).—Papa and Mamma were so sure it would be a boy this time that they named it Tommy, but it was a girl just the same, and then there were seven, all of similar gender. Did the long-suffering mother bewail her lot? Far from it. She was prouder than ever. Time went by and the seven well-grown daughters left father no place to smoke his pipe or peruse his evening paper in peace, for lovers galore began to flock about the house and overrun the lawn. Six times had the marriage bells rung for that household, and mother and father were rid of all the daughters, but tantalizing Tommy. This did not stop the perturbation of mother, for the young wives came hurrying back with various woeful tales of awkwardly darned socks with the knots inside, of burning meals, not to remark other troubles of the newly made nests. But mother was ever a diplomat and delighted in straightening out troubles.

Tommy still remained to be comforted and snuggled. Then there was a "coming home day," when the six daughters came hustling in with seven babies, one having an extra in the shape of twins. There were seven beds, ranging in size from the crib to the bassinet, dragged down from the attic and again brought into use, while proud grandpa and smiling grandma tiptoed in to view this wonderful spectacle, and then, as a climax to it all, they observed Tommy captured at last in the arms of the stalwart and sympathetic young doctor.

A MILITANT SUFFRAGETTE (Pathe—Five Parts).—The indifferent reception by her mother, who is a zealous worker in the Suffragette cause, drives Nellie, just returned from a long absence at boarding school, and her father to her sister's home. While enjoying the pleasures of life in the country, the young girl is attracted by a passing horseman, who later proves to be Lord Ascue, a member of Parliament. All efforts to meet him are thwarted by her companions to whom the stranger is known. She even goes so far as to invent ways of meeting him which fail until the news is brought her of a chance to be introduced at a forthcoming garden party. In the meantime one of the girl's companions, having gained her father's permission to lay siege to her heart, takes advantage of Ascue's inability to attend the party, to plead his cause, but without success. The downcast lover confides his failure to the girl's father, whose interference in the case provokes her to return to her mother.

The discontent of her daughter offers the mother the opportunity to attract her to the suffragette movement and the girl immediately becomes a zealous worker. Her arrest follows shortly after her activities in a crusade, and a hunger strike wins her freedom. In the meantime, Lord Ascue, having neglected his fiance, is threatened by her with breach of promise suit with his love letters as evidence. The suffragettes hear he is preparing an anti-suffragette bill which he intends to bring before Parliament and plan a sweeping campaign. The Lord's fiance gives the women valuable ammunition against him in the form of the love letters and Nellie grasps the opportunity, not knowing the man she plans to strike down is the stranger she loves.

The young suffragette goes forth to subdue the enemy of the women's cause, armed with the love letters and a bomb, which she places in the statesman's study, set to explode at midnight; but her mission fails. The identity of the man now known to her, Nellie immediately plans to undo her rash act and save her lover. A note is addressed to Lord Ascue, warning him of his danger, but his answer relieves the girl by leading her to believe he will be out of danger through his absence from home when the bomb goes off. She learns later from a newspaper that the meeting he is to attend is to be in his own home, and vainly tries to warn him of impending danger. Through the help of one of his colleagues, Nellie finally succeeds in having Lord Ascue leave his study to see her, just as the bomb explodes. To allay suspicion of his friends, the girl is announced as the Lord's fiance and a little later their mutual love for each other is proclaimed. The statesman has the support of Parliament in his fight against votes for women, but the girl has sacrificed her cause for a victory by the heart.

THE SWAMP FOX (Kalem—Three Parts).—Marauding Cherokees attack the cabin of Jacques Videau, at the edge of the settlement. One of the pioneers witnesses the attack and rides for help. He notifies Francis Marion. The latter heads the settlers who go to the rescue. The Indians set Videau's home afire. The family rush out into the open to escape from the flames. All are promptly slain by the savages, with the exception of Mary, Videau's ten-year-old daughter. The chief of the Cherokees makes her his prisoner. The arrival of the settlers causes the Indians to retreat. Later, they ambush the pioneers. A terrific hand-to-hand battle takes place. Marion's heroism inspires the settlers to victory. The young leader rescues Mary from the Indians. His heart filled with pity for the poor, homeless orphan, Marion offers her a home with his sister, Mrs. Sharp. Mary becomes one of the family. Ten years later, Marion, now a Provincial Congressman, returns home to find that Mary has grown into glorious womanhood. He falls in love with her, but because circumstances seem to indicate that Gabriel, his nephew, and Mary are in love with each other, he conceals his affection.

Balfour, a young Tory, also loves the girl. Gabriel comes upon him in the act of forcing his attentions upon Mary and fells him. A duel ensues. Attracted to the scene, Marion interferes. Balfour's taunts cause Marion to take Gabriel's place. He disarms the Tory and orders him off. News of Cornwallis' landing at Charleston is brought to Marion. He immediately organizes a body of partisan troops. They adopt the first American flag, the famous rattlesnake design with the words, "Don't tread on me," underneath. Marion offers the services of his men to General Gates, but that arrogant officer, styling the sturdy farmers as a band of vagabonds, declines to enlist them. At the same time, Balfour organizes a band of Tories to ravage the patriots' homes.

General Marion and his men become a thorn in the side of the British. The Continentals learn that a British force will shortly pass near their rendezvous at Snow Island. Sallying forth, they ambush the English and capture the entire force. Marion also learns that Gates has been defeated by the British and is being held prisoner at the redcoat encampment some miles away. Dashing into the midst of the British with his force, he throws them into panic and rescues the Continental officer. Returning to his camp in the swamp, the "Swamp Fox" invites his captives to dinner. To their amazement, the English officers learn that the meal consists solely of baked potatoes served on a pine chip. Cornwallis sends Colonel Tarleton, known as "The Butcher," to capture "The Swamp Fox." Balfour offers to aid Tarleton to capture Marion's home and camp. A friendly innkeeper hastens to the Marion home and warns Mrs. Sharp of the British approach. Mrs. Sharp, her daughter and Mary flee to the home of Mrs. Motte for shelter. In his anger at finding his quarry flown, Tarleton vandalizes the house. The man then hastens to Marion's camp with his soldiers, but vanished, the "Swamp Fox" makes his escape. Tarleton proceeds to Mrs. Motte's home, where he makes his headquarters after driving the inmates, with the exception of Mary, forth. At Balfour's behest, Tarleton charges the girl with being a dangerous spy.

Marion learns of Mary's imprisonment. Furious, he determines to attack Tarleton. Just at this time, he receives a small cannon as a gift from General Washington. The "Swamp Fox" surrounds the Motte home. Unaware that the ladies have been driven forth, he sends Gabriel forward with a flag of truce, requesting Tarleton to remove Mrs. Motte, his sister and children before he commences the attack. The little cannon bravely answers the fire of the heavy British artillery. Unaware that Mary is a prisoner in the house, Marion has one of his men set the place afire with burning arrows. Balfour sees that the Continentals will prove victorious. Entering the room in which Mary is confined, he tells her of his intention to kill her. Just at this moment, Marion and his men sweep the British before them in a desperate charge. Balfour is just about to slay Mary, when Marion and his men burst into the room. One of the men shoots as Balfour raises his pistol. The Tory falls dead. Two months later, the surrender of Cornwallis clears the South of the British. Marion writes his sister that he is about to return. Mary hears the news with delight.

Marion comes home. Believing that Mary was in love with Gabriel, he strives to express his sympathy for her bereavement. To his intense surprise, Mary throws her arms about his neck. Knowing him too diffident to propose, the girl pops the question. For a moment the "Swamp Fox" is taken back. Then, filled with delight, he seizes her in his arms.

ECLECTIC

THE PERILS OF PAULINE (Fourth Episode—May 4).—We see the travelers preparing to start on the last stage of their journey to the Treasure Island. They engage a cook for the yacht, and after having received Pauline's approval of the cook, we see them evidently persuading the cook to put poison in her food. The old pirate, however, being of a rather excitable nature, has a quarrel with the cook and uses such arguments, that the cook quits on the spot. Harry, who is suspicious, has been following and hears the cook quit. He disguises himself as a cook and is taken along to provide for the "inner man." His cooking is not a brilliant success, and the old pirate disapproves so strongly that Harry is in great danger. He, however, is saved by Paulin's intervention. Later, when he thinks he is alone, he removes his disguise, but Owen sees him without it. Owen immediately hunts up his fellow conspirators and they decide to kill two birds with one stone, and double their winnings. They plant a bomb in the yacht and row away, leaving Pauline and Harry to their fate. Harry, however, accidentally discovers the infernal machine, and he and Paulin jump overboard before the explosion occurs.

We see the yacht sailing on, when suddenly it blows up—very spectacular. Pauline and Harry are rescued by a passing liner, and later the three conspirators are picked up. They, of course, think that their plot has been successful, but suddenly they see Harry and Pauline on the deck of the vessel. Owen and Hicks cannot afford to have any suspicion cast upon them, so they bribe the old sailor to take the whole blame, and he, upon being discovered by Harry and Pauline, jumps overboard. Harry accuses Owen, but Owen tells him the very plausible story that the old pirate had done the trick to get even with the cook, and that they had not discovered it until after Pauline and Harry had escaped, when they seized the old pirate and had intended handing him over to justice. Harry, of course, does not believe him, but Pauline does, and this lays the way for the villains to continue their plotting.

MOUNTAIN LAW (April 26).—After the feud between the Hawkins and the Tyler families each member of the families pledges himself or herself to a peace compact. When peaceful intercourse begins, Bob meets and falls in love with Bess Tyler. Learning that peace is declared, Bill Tyler, brother of Bess, and notorious for his cowardice, returns to his home in the hills. One day he meets the elder Hawkins and holds out his hand. But Hawkins will not shake hands with a coward. A fight ensues which results in the shooting and killing of Hawkins. Bess has been watching from a distance. Bill leaves the dead man. Bess comes to him. She finds Bill's gun on the ground. She takes possession of this evidence of the crime, but unwittingly leaves her own gun in its place.

Bob finds the body of his father and the weapon which presumably caused his death. He believes that Bess shot his father. To shield her and to keep the feud from again breaking out, Bob makes a great sacrifice. He writes a note and pins it upon his father's coat. It reads: "Don't start the feud over this, for I killed father in a quarrel. I am going away. Bob Hawkins."

After Bob leaves the body the note is blown away from the dead man into the bushes. The feud breaks out again fiercer than before. Bob and Bill engage in a deadly combat and Bill is killed. Bess is a witness to the combat. She raises her gun and shoots Bob. An instant later she finds the note left by Bob and realizes his sacrifice.

Fortune favors him and he applies for a position the same day that Clawson, the Smalleys' cameraman, is injured. Waterloo is given the injured man's place and the strange, unfortunate and thrilling experience he goes through during his first and only day's work in this business, furnishes the material for the comedy. Waterloo is shocked at the results of his work. The director is paralyzed and the actors rise in a body and go after the unfortunate young man. Waterloo escapes with his life—never again to enter a motion picture studio.

Rosslyn's son, Wallace, an attorney, is in love with Mary Rohan, a stenographer, who supports her aged parents. Mary's father becomes ill and consults with employees of the quack concern. His illness increases and Dr. Rosslyn is called in. Not aware that the man had been treated by his own concern, Dr. Rosslyn freely admits that he is dying on account of cumulative poisoning from patent medicines. After the old man's death, Mary and Wallace assist the medical authorities in running down the guilty practitioners. The investigation brings to light Dr. Rosslyn's double interests. The son hastens to defend his father while Mary appears against him for the prosecution. Dr. Rosslyn is convicted. Before he enters prison he tells Wallace that the girl did right and that he has already forgiven her. Wallace seeks Mary out and reconciliation follows.

THE SKELETON (April 13).—Two friends, Tad and Jack, are conversing with each other at the club, when Dr. Matthews, the wealthiest man in town, enters. In contemplating the rich man, the two young men speculate as to whether or not, with all his wealth, he is happy. The argument leads them to a wager. Tad bets $1,000 that there is something in the physician's life he would hate to have known, and that as a consequence he is unhappy. Jack accepts the bet. A short time afterward Jack is called away from home on business for an indefinite period. He leaves his wife behind.

After a few months, during which Tad had been watching the physician's movements carefully, he follows the physician to Jack's home. It is as he thought. He will win the bet at the expense of his friend's wife. While he stands upon the porch sadly contemplating this, Jack returns. He sees that something is wrong. He suspects Tad. Tad tries to protect the wife, but Jack is dazed with the blow. They hurry into the house. Jack finds that his wife has just brought him a handsome baby. Tad makes his check for $1,000, and gives it to the new arrival.

THE TAINT OF THE ALIEN (April 24).—Dr. Arnold, a famous criminologist, disagrees with his associates concerning his pet subject. To prove his point, he disguises himself as a tough and goes into the slums to gather the necessary data. While in a low dive he makes the acquaintance of Luigi, an Italian criminal. Luigi is the cause of a brawl, ending in an affray in which Dr. Arnold and the Italian receive deep knife wounds. The injured men are removed to a hospital. The physician has lost so much blood that his life is despaired of. Luigi agrees to allow his blood to be transferred into Dr. Arnold with the stipulation that he be spared prosecution.

The operation is performed and the doctor recovers. He becomes conscious that, with the Italian's blood, the criminal tendencies were transferred to him. He fights against the thought, but it masters him. To his horror, he finds on returning home one night, that he has stolen a costly necklace from a woman acquaintance. He consults a professional associate and they agree that the only method of saving him will be to perform another operation and inject into his blood a serum which will neutralize the effects of the Italian's blood. The operation is performed. The taint of the alien blood is found to be removed and he has the right of a good man to ask a good woman to marry him.

THE HUNGRY SOLDIERS (May 4).—The Colonel and his wife give a dinner to the Captain. The Colonel resolves to give the cook a cigar. He goes to the kitchen and finds the cook kissing the maid, who is peeved. A little later the Colonel is interrupted by an altercation and finds that Thin, a hungry soldier, has been paying attention to the maid and that he and the cook are having an argument. The soldier is ordered back to quarters. In the messroom the soldiers grumble at their grub. The Colonel's wife sends a costume to the Captain to wear at the fancy dress ball if he has sufficiently recovered from his bad cold. He has not and sends the costume back to Lee. Lee takes it to the messroom and a happy idea enters his torpid, hungry brain and he imparts it to his companions. He dons the costume and attends the ball and makes havoc with the luncheon table. Lee departs and in turn four other soldiers don the uniform and eat a hearty meal. His disguise is penetrated and he confesses. The Colonel looks into the mess question and the cook is placed under arrest, leaving a clear field for Thin and the maid to do their courting unmolested.

STOLEN GLORY (May 8).—Paul Devine, an unrecognized actor, and Richard Storm, a struggling playwright, are the principal characters in this romantic drama. Each loves Jane Dare, an actress and woman of unusual emotional depth. Although she respects Storm as a close friend, it is Devine she loves. A theatrical manager makes the proposition to Devine that if he will secure a sufficiently strong play he will star him in it. The actor carries the news to Storm, who has just had his latest drama rejected. Storm gives his friend the rejected play to read. Disappointed in love and discouraged in his work, Storm strolls to the waterfront to contemplate his reverses. While there he is set upon and shanghaied on a tramp steamer. Devine is carried away with Storm's play, but he cannot find the author. He is led to believe that Storm has committed suicide.

Devine erases Storm's name from the title page and writes his own there in its stead. The play is produced with himself and Jane Dare in the title roles. It proves to be a success. Devine and Jane are married. Storm returns. He goes to Devine's theater and demands that credit, financial and artistic, be given him. Jane enters. Storm hides and is a witness of her love for Devine. After Jane leaves, Storm undergoes a change of mind. He tells Devine that for Jane's sake he can have the play. Storm goes away to oblivion.

CRYSTAL.

A TELEPHONE ENGAGEMENT (May 5).—Bashful visits the White household. He is madly in love with the elder of the two sisters. However, he cannot sum up courage enough to propose to her. The younger sister, Pearl, is also in love with Bashful, but thinks her chances too slim for consideration. She feels in duty bound to her elder sister to refrain from letting her love be known. Various humorous situations develop, but still Bashful is unable to gather enough nerve to ask the fair damsel to be his bride. He picks up a book and reads a chapter of a man, who, like him, was too bashful to propose and does so by telephone. Struck with the idea, he pursues that course. Strangely the younger sister answers the phone and when he proposes, she accepts. He calls and is thunderstruck when she greets him with a kiss. He is too confused to refute her imputations and has to be content with the younger girl.

OUT ON BUSINESS (May 6).—Smith and Jones have a habit of staying out late. Mrs. Jones writes a letter to Mrs. Smith, unfolding a scheme to keep their men at home. She proposes robbing her house disguised as burglars, and then tying themselves up, leaving their husbands to assume that they have been maltreated and that their place was home. Mr. Smith finds the letter, and determines to show up their scheme. The plan works out all right; all the loot is packed, but the scheme is spoiled by a real burglar who arrives late, and after really tying up the women, walking with the spoils. The men return, and give their wives a hearty laugh. However their laughter turns to tears when they discover that it is no hoax, but a real burglary.

A PAIR OF BIRDS (May 10).—Mr. Bird leaves his wife to go on a business trip. Her maid also leaves for a short vacation. Mrs. Bird decides to close up house and visit her mother. She writes a note to the milkman and the baker, instructing them not to leave milk or rolls at the house for two days. This note she pins to the door. Her husband suddenly returns home, however, and seeing the note assumes that his wife has gone away. He goes on a foraging expedition for something to eat. Mrs. Bird also decides that her place is in her home and returns unexpectedly. She goes upstairs. She hears a noise and is convinced that a burglar is present. She gets a revolver and goes downstairs. Smith also thinks there is a burglar in the house. Then ensues a series of maneuvers that finally results in each gaining the street, the wife first, and getting the services of a minion of the law. Each returns with a minion, but hubby returns with his protection first. The cop comes upon hubby and a terrific battle ensues. Mrs. Bird finally comes to her spouse's rescue. The officer leaves the couple to console each other as best they can.

UNIVERSAL IKE.

UNIVERSAL IKE ALMOST A HERO (May 5).—Ike loves Louise. She accepts him without consulting her mother. Therefore when the mother chooses the sheriff for her son-in-law, Ike is forced to win the girl by other means than gentle words. Ike, in a field one day, stumbles across a scarecrow. It recalls to him the description of a one-armed bandit for whose capture a reward is offered. He plans to use the dummy in a manner which will bring discredit upon the sheriff. He props up the scarecrow against a tree and runs a hose from the dummy to the interior of the barn. Ike then stations himself inside the barn and holds up all those who pass, delivering his commands through the hose. The sheriff is notified of the presence of the hold-up man, but he is awed and shrinks from the bold, bad man. At the psychological moment, Ike struts upon the scene. He gives the dummy battle and captures him. Ike becomes the hero of the hour and the idol of Louise. At the height of Ike's popularity a farmer appears and accuses Ike of stealing his scarecrow. The rest is soft and plaintive music.

Willie hastened home to his father's library to immortalize the lady in verse. But removed from the inspiring presence, the poet found that the lyric rapture lagged. He tapped his forehead and bit his nails, but romance was fled. At this crisis the beautiful lady whom Willie's daddy called Erato, the nurse of love, poetry, took pity on the suffering swain and led him right through her gilded frame directly into the Country of Romance. There Willie found himself a humble little page in doublet and hose, secretly in love with Her Exalted Majesty, the Demoiselle Clara, princess of the realm. The princess, too, had seen and loved him. But neither dared speak, she through maidenly modesty, and he through awe of her exalted rank. So the little princess sickened and pined.

And in this wonderful land of dreams Willie experiences exciting and weird adventures. His awakening—well, that is surprising, too. Also it is a happy one for both Willie and Clara.

The Mexican, seeking revenge, breaks into Madge's room and steals some trinkets and jewelry. He is caught in the act by Big Jack, but escapes. As Jack is standing over the open jewel case the girl's lover, who has arrived, enters and accuses him of trying to rob Madge. Heartbroken and in disgrace he leaves the ranch and for the sake of Madge restrains his anger at the unjust accusation.

Some time later Madge is married to Frank and after the jollifications leave on their honeymoon. They do not know big Jack has returned and persuaded the driver to let him take the reins of the horses from the house to the depot. Half way there they are waylaid by the Mexican and his accomplices. Jack springs down and making known his identity unhitches the horses and tells Madge and her husband to ride for assistance and he will hold off the band from behind the wagon. A terrible pistol battle takes place. Jack is wounded time and again, but manages to hold off the Mexicans until assistance arrives. It is too late, however, and the big cowboy dies in Madge's arms, not, however, before he has been exonerated of the theft which Frank had unjustly accused him of.

VICTOR.

PAWNS OF DESTINY (Three parts—May 8).—Tom Hansell, a struggling young lawyer, occupies the attic room in Mrs. Jones' tenement rooming house. He has as a partner John Stone, once a successful lawyer, but now a relic of the past, due to over-indulgence in drink. Their practice is limited to little or no clients and only through Tom's hard and studious work are they kept from starving. The house is practically cared for by Flo, a slavey, whom Mrs. Jones adopted when but an orphan child, and who has been raised without the advantage of education except that which she managed to scrape up through a natural desire for the better things in life. She notices the plight of Tom and the great privations he endures and at various times while he is absent from the room, she brings bits of delicacies and places them on his table. Tom is so disheartened by ill luck he never thinks to inquire who his strange benefactor is. Even when she is cleaning his room he never stops his studies to look up and answer any question she may ask him.

One day Tom comes home, and sitting at his table, takes up his studies. The room is chilly and damp and he decides to light the stove. It is a bit old and does not respond readily, so he pours the kerosene from his lamp on the flames. Instantly there is an explosion which blinds Tom. The room enveloped in flames and smoke, Tom gropes around in his helpless condition and finally drops to the floor, suffocated. Flo sees what has happened and, seizing a dampened apron, rushes to Tom's room and drags him out. She reaches the landing before him and Flo begs Mrs. Jones to take Tom back, but seeing no way of getting any money from him for the room since he is blind and unable to work, she refuses. Flo begs piteously and upon her promise to double her efforts in her already hard task of housekeeping, Mrs. Jones consents. John continued the law practice of the firm, and loyally sticks to Tom, dividing his scant earnings with him. Flo is also of great comfort to him. This raises the ire of Mrs. Jones and one day, missing Flo about the house, she goes to Tom's room and discovers Flo reading to him. She pounces upon them and accuses them of misconduct, of which they are innocent. She tells Tom he must marry Flo and she leaves immediately to get a minister to perform the ceremony. Tom protests against this, for although he loves Flo he loves in his present helpless condition he can only be a burden to her. At this moment John enters the room with a letter for Tom. It is a notification of the death of his wealthy uncle, making Tom the sole heir of his immense fortune. Tom is in a position now to marry Flo and he loses no time in asking her, to which she readily consents.

We next find them in their home. Flo is surrounded by servants in a luxuriously furnished home. The maid's dress appeals to the simplicity of Flo's mind and she insists on wearing one as a house gown. While reading a newspaper, John sees an article about an eye specialist restoring the sight of a man whose blindness was caused in the same way that Tom's was. They have him come to the house and examine Tom. He consents to undertake the operation. Everything is made ready, the operation performed, and the doctors return to the library to await the result of their work. While they are waiting, Tom leaves his room, and going to the window where the light is strong, he finds a faint light piercing the bandage on his eyes. Raising them he finds that he can see, and tearing the bandage from his head, runs about the room. His thoughts now are only of his wife. Rushing downstairs he calls for her, and going through the hall he passes Flo and the servants. In her maid's dress he mistakes Flo for a servant, too, and rushes by her still calling for his wife. Flo fears that he may not love the simple little girl now that he can see, and goes to her room weeping. Tom comes back and asks the servants for his wife. They tell him she has gone upstairs. He goes to the room and closing his eyes to bring on the same effect as when he was blind, he strokes Flo's head with his hand. The sense of touch tells him that it is the head of his wife. Clasping her in his arms, he tells her again of his great love.

Here is the TRUTH, the whole TRUTH and nothing but the TRUTH about

Reflecting Projection Screens

Discussion by F. J. REMBUSCH

Patentee and Inventor of the "MIRROR SCREEN"

Mr. Exhibitor—You can certainly learn all about screens, because there are only three kinds of screens used in moving pictures.

The three kinds of screens are the White Sheet or Wall—the Metallized Surfaces (meaning all surfaces painted with a shiny paint, such as aluminum, gold bronze, etc.)—and the "MIRROR SCREEN."

THE "MIRROR SCREEN" IS THE PEERLESS SURFACE OF THE WORLD FOR A HUNDRED REASONS, BUT ESPECIALLY THE FOLLOWING:

1. The "Mirror Screen" reflects a picture that don't look like a moving picture, but like real, living, flesh and blood people and actual scenes. The Mirror is a secret. Stand in front of a mirror and you see your real self as you are. A motion picture caught on the "Mirror Screen" (in front of a Mirror) looks real and not like painted scenery.

2. The "Mirror Screen" is the greatest economical factor in the moving picture theatre because you get More Benefit from your light. That's natural because a Mirror is the most powerful reflector in the world.

3. The "Mirror Screen" is manufactured scientifically so that all of the "Picture Light" is reflected towards the viewing space of your house and not scattered like a White Wall or Sheet. We reflect the "Picture Light" towards the seats in your house, and reflect all of it.

4. The "Mirror Screen" for a narrow house is made so that the light is concentrated to a narrow angle. For a wide house the light is distributed at a wide angle. In this way you always get the benefit of all of your light and every seat in the viewing space receives the same amount of "Picture Light." Please notice no other surface can be made to do this.

5. The "Mirror Screen" is made from the finest quality of white, crystal Plate Glass—Plate Glass is the most perfect Plane (get me right), PLANE surface in the world. Therefore, you never have any uneven places, bumps, seams, clouds or distortion. YOU GET THE MOST PERFECT FOCUS.

6. The "Mirror Screen" is made by mirroring with pure silver this magnificent Plate Glass. It is tested and must reflect by photometric measurements 98% of light. We then destroy the mirror entirely by prismizing the face to a dull white finish. Remember the image of a moving picture is only visible on a dull surface. The picture will not show on a highly polished surface such as a plane mirror, a highly polished piece of steel, a shiny surface or cloth of any kind. A "Mirror Screen" is not a mirror any more than a brick is not clay after it has been burnt.

7. A motion picture is visible only by diffuse reflection. A shiny surface reflects regular reflection, a dully-rough surface reflects diffuse reflection. Remember this fact, it is important. Pictures on a "Mirror Screen" are reflected by diffuse reflection only, the same as a White Wall but 1,000% clearer and better because the light is not scattered, but is returned to the viewing space with brilliancy and power. Keep in mind we retain the stereoscopic effect of a real mirror.

8. If you are using a Metallized Screen you have a surface that is shiny-rough. The shiny elements reflect regular reflection, the rough elements reflect your picture. The two kinds of reflected light rays interfere (SUPERIMPOSE). You have glare and haze. You cuss and blame the film manufacturers for poor photography when it is your shiny screen that causes that foggy, out-of-focus appearance. The more light you use the more haze you have. The proof of it is the brighter the Metallized Screen the more haze. Try it yourself if you don't believe me. Ask any scientist. It can't be overcome because it is one of the laws of the ALMIGHTY.

9. The human eye can't view a shiny surface in comfort. That's why there is eye complaint where the Metallized Screens are used. Ask any oculist. You can't use enough light to make the pictures visible. You can put 1000 amperes on a "Mirror Screen" and the reflected light will be delightful because every light beam is diffused. The idea of "too bright a picture" is eliminated on the "Mirror Screen." I have six theaters and use from 50 to 100 amperes of direct current, and more if I can get it. You should see my pictures and hear what my patrons say about them. At the same time I will forfeit $1000.00 to anyone that will produce a surface that will show as much reflection as my "Mirror Screen."

10. I believe I know as much, if not more, about screens than any man living because for ten years I have experimented continuously on projection surfaces. Furthermore, I know that exhibitors know less about screens than anything connected with their business. For seven years the "Mirror Screen" has been on the market. Every Tom, Dick and Harry who gets a paint brush and some aluminum or gold bronze will tell you that he can equal the "Mirror Screen." They copy the name Mirror and will make any sort of a statement, but they can't back it up.

Quit experimenting. Study the proposition. Get a "Mirror Screen" and make your pictures visible—VISIBLE—"If it would do any good I would sing it"—Make your Pictures Visible, Visible. Let me tell you more about why you can't get a clear picture on a shiny surface. It's simple. If you want one light to be visible there must be no interfering light and if you let the sunlight fall on your screen your picture goes out, and the more shine there is to your screen the more your picture goes out. You can't get away from it any more than you can make water run up hill.

Let me send a representative to show you. Send for our samples of new Snow-White finish. Get a screen that won't hurt your eyes or put a haze and fog in your pictures—a screen that you can put on the light. Say, Mr. Exhibitor, that is what you are selling—"Picture Light." The "Mirror Screen" produces real, true, "Picture Light." Write today. I want to hear from YOU.

Very cordially yours,
MIRROR SCREEN CO.,
SHELBYVILLE, INDIANA.

FJR/FAH F. J. Rembusch.

P. S.—If you are bound to have a cheap metallized curtain, we have Goldcloth and Mirrorcloth, on rollers or stretchers, and we will exchange them for a "Mirror Screen" when you get ready. Ask for our samples and prices.

Lucille takes up a telephone receiver that morning to find that the wires are crossed. She overhears a conversation between Loubeque and his accomplice in which the spy admits that the documents are in his possession, and that he intends leaving Manila on the steamship Empress at once. Lucille decides on the spot that she will regain possession of the documents if she has to follow Loubeque to the ends of the earth. She at once realizes that her only chance of reaching the Empress before it puts well to sea, is through the aid of the government aviator, Gibson's rival for her hand. The aviator lends his assistance. She springs into the hydroplane and in a moment later is skipping over the waters in the wake of the Empress. Little does Hugo Loubeque dream that his Nemesis is above his head and ready to land by his side as he contemplates that the last great stroke in his plan of revenge is nearing completion.

The second story of this series opens when Lucille deserts the hydroplane in the open ocean and makes a sensational landing upon the steamship. Then, for the first time, Loubeque becomes aware that his program of revenge is being interfered with. The moment he sees the girl he is struck by her resemblance to his first love, who in reality was Lucille's mother. Loubeque's first move aboard the ship is to have sent out an unsigned wireless message to the effect that General Love and not his aide, proved a traitor by selling the diplomatic secrets. After this message is sent out, and to prevent further communications with the ship, Loubeque disarranges the wireless apparatus. In doing so he causes an explosion in which he is injured. Lucille realizes that her opportunity has arrived, and she volunteers to nurse him. Her services are accepted. She is soon on friendly terms with the international spy, but seek as she will the hiding place of the documents remains a mystery.

Fortune, however, favors her. A fierce fire breaks out in the hold of the ship. Lucille is with Loubeque in his stateroom when the impending disaster is announced. With the first shock of the news the spy's first thought is of the valuable documents and his startled glance toward a desk reveals to Lucille the hiding place of the stolen papers. Loubeque leaves the room for an instant, and the next instant Lucille finds the papers and thrusts them in her bosom. The fire in the hold is now burning fiercely, and all hope for the ship is lost. The lifeboats are lowered and the rule of "women first" is adhered to.

Realizing that he must desert the ship at once the spy rushes to his cabin only to find the papers gone. He then realizes that his late nurse is no other than Lucille Love, daughter of his deadliest enemy. He rushes to the ship's rail just in time to see the boat in which Lucille is seated, lowered into the angry sea.

"Well played, Miss Love," he cries, "but I'm afraid you will have to return the papers." No sooner does Lucille's boat touch the water than it is capsized and all the women occupants are left to the mercy of the waves. The burning ship listing almost to the water's edge, the ocean spotted with the dying and the dead, Lucille grasps a floating timber and clings to it until she loses consciousness. When she regains her senses she finds herself upon a long stretch of beach; a castaway upon one of the South Sea Islands.

CIGAR BUTTS (April 28).—Brace, a tramp, sits on a park bench dying for a smoke. A stranger seats himself beside Brace smoking a cigar-butt. Brace tells the stranger that he will recite a fine story for the present of that cigar-butt. The offer is accepted. Brace tell this tale:

The Customs Service is trying to catch clever diamond smugglers. Brace, a customs service detective, is given the job. He searches in vain. One day a girl walks by him and drops a cigar box. The cigars roll out and into the mud. The girl is greatly excited. She quickly collects the cigars and even takes the muddy ones. Brace's assistance is impolitely refused. The girl rushes off. Brace surprised at her strange actions, examines the forgotten cigar and finds an uncut diamond in its center. Here at last is the trail! He follows the girl, but loses her. In disgust he comes to an ashman who is complaining over a barrel filled with cigar ends. "Same old story," says the ashman, "Dese guys keep throwin' out good seegars all cut up and not a one smoked." Gee! Brace realizes that this is the lair of the smugglers. He makes up as a poor Italian, and rents the room above that in which is the gang. The house is an old one and is heated by a hot-air furnace. The heat comes through gratings. There is one of these in the gang's room, and one in Brace's room. Through this Brace hears the gang's conversation.

He rushes home, gets his phonograph and several records. The gang sees him as he returns with them. They sneak up to his room. He hears them coming and puts on the record "Rigoletto." They burst into his room to find an Italian music lover marking time to the opera. Their suspicions are allayed. They go back to their plotting. The phonograph records their schemes as they come through the furnace grating.

The gang is caught red-handed. Then Brace brings in his phonograph. He puts on the record of the gang's plots. The gang hear their voices and chafe at their bonds in a rage. Then Brace puts on the record of the song, "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town To-Night." In fury the gang are carried out struggling and cursing.

The story is done. The stranger is pleased. "That's a corking good story. Here's a good cigar for telling it to me." And he gives one to Brace. Brace isn't used to smoking cigars. He cuts it in two, puts one piece in his pocket, and lights the other. Then he smokes happily away.

THANHOUSER.

FROM THE FLAMES (2 parts—April 21).—The old millionaire had a son and a niece. The son had well nigh broken the old millionaire's heart by his extravagances, while the niece was all that any man could desire. After many attempts to reform the son, the millionaire finally made his will leaving everything to the niece and urging her to do what she could to reform the son. The document was drawn in the office of a lawyer and it happened that his clerk was a friend of the son. The clerk saw the chance to make some money and proposed to the son that the will be suppressed. The son accepted, the clerk acted and when the millionaire died the lawyer could not find any will, although he had carefully deposited it in his own safe.

Under the circumstances the son inherited everything and the niece was turned out into the world. One of the servants, who dearly loved the niece, was the old housekeeper, and although she loathed her new master she remained at her post, being convinced that there had been crooked work and declaring that she will expose him. Fortune played in her favor and the plucky old woman recovered the document in an extremely novel way. She turned it over to the lawyer at his suburban home and was followed by the crooks who were, however, unable to overtake her. During night they tried to steal the document from the house, but the lawyer was alert. In the shuffle that ensued a lighted lamp was upset and the house was soon in flames. A brave fireman came to the rescue, however, and managed to save the will, which turned the good niece into a wealthy woman and made the reckless son dependent upon her bounty.

THE STRATEGY OF CONDUCTOR 786 (April 26).—No. 786, the veteran conductor on the trolley line, had some passengers whom he liked and others he detested. On his good books were a couple who pleased him mightily by falling in love. The girl was his favorite passenger. The young man had ingratiated himself with the conductor by offering to testify for him when an unpleasant old woman threatened to report him. Day after day the young couple would strike the car with No. 786 and the conductor heartily approved of their courtship. The girl had a father, an unpleasant old man, who laid up trouble for himself by quarreling with the conductor. Going home in a grumpy frame of mind one night the father unexpectedly surprised the girl and her suitor.

Like many fathers, he objected to seeing his daughter happy, ordered the young man from the house and made preparations to take the girl to a boarding school. They started off the next morning and the little god cupid so arranged things that they took the car of Conductor No. 786. While the father was engrossed in his newspaper, the girl told her sad story and the kindly old conductor decided to aid her. He called the father to the platform, explained that the money he had given for his fare was counterfeit and before the old man could properly object he had been thrown off the car, which continued merrily on its way with the daughter he had brought to take to boarding school. A newsboy utilized as messenger to call up the young man in the case and he met the car at the end of the line, whisking the girl off to a minister. The father arrived in time to denounce the street car conductor, but the "lead dime with a hole in it" was evidence against him even though he told the truth when he said he had never seen it before.

Several years pass. Dora gives a house party for her daughter, Sunshine, and Frank, the son of Lytton is invited, his father to come also for a week-end. Frank and Sunshine fall in love. Then Mary unexpectedly returns from abroad and Dora looks at her in astonishment—"Sorrow has made you beautiful, sister!"

Mary alone cares to go canoeing in the moonlight, with Frank, and the moon plays Cupid, so that Frank proposes (having been rejected by Sunshine) and, after great insistence, is accepted. And then—"Sunshine—shatters fond illusions" and Mary, in the light of the sun, does not bear comparison with her younger rival, Sunshine. Mary realizes that Frank is not for her and she returns the ring. Lytton has arrived and been presented to Mary by Frank as her new father-in-law, however, just before this, and when Lytton searches her out he does not know of her renunciation. Still believing her the demimonde, he pleads with her "Spare my son!" and again offers money. Mary's heart is broken. She rushes to the lagoon and paddles out. In the library Sunshine and Frank find happiness before the fireplace. Flashing back to the lagoon the empty canoe is seen drifting before the moon, which again breaks through the clouds that would cover its face.

THE STORY OF THE OLIVE (May 6).—In Southern California lived Jose de Cabrillo on an estate which he had inherited from his ancestors, who obtained the land from the king of Spain. The scene is laid in the year 1840. "Before the Gringo came." A young American, Sam Blythe, who wishes to settle in California, notices in riding by the gate of the ranch, that it is offered for sale. He says he will buy it if the olive industry is what he desires.

Mercedes, the daughter of Jose, is incensed at the thought of her father's selling the ranch, and especially so when she thinks of an American as a possible owner. The young American is shown all the processes of the olive industry from the moment of the picking of the olives to the finished product—the oil.

When paid the gold for the purchase of the ranch, Jose puts the gold in his desk. Ortega, the Spanish fireman, sees this and robs the desk. He refuses to share with his accomplices, who capture and kill him by placing him in the olive press. Prior to this the American has recovered the gold from the thief and in admiration of his bravery, Mercedes relents and the love that she has really felt all the time is manifested and the ranch is still her's and the American's.

BEAUTY FILM

EUGENICS VERSUS LOVE (May 5).—A new breakfast food company has started to manufacture a food called "Desiccated Embrosia." In order to advertise the new food and obtain a proper trademark, they decide to bring about an Eugenic Wedding. As a prize to the successful candidates who will agree to marry and settle down in Battle River, California, and allow their pictures to be used as a trademark, they propose to offer $5,000 in stock in the new company. Many applicants arrive, but all prove to be women. As a consequence, Squint Bumpus, a man about town, being employed as a delivery boy for the corner grocery, is thrust into the Eugenic competition on account of his physical qualifications. These arrangements do not meet with Squint's approval, as he had formed a love affair with the Belle of Battle River, Maggie Pemiento. The young couple put their heads together and decide to extricate Squint from the entanglement by getting married at once. Squint not having reached his majority, is unable to obtain a marriage certificate. Maggie, the girl, remembers that his birthday, that is when he reaches the age of 21, will be in three days and they decide to forcebably hide the Eugenic woman, who was selected as Squint's future bride. Worried over the disappearance of the Eugenic woman, the breakfast food directors offer a $5,000 reward for information leading to her whereabouts. On Squint's 21st birthday, Maggie takes the precaution of marrying him and they then disclose the whereabouts of the Eugenic woman and receive a reward.

CAPT. F. E. KLEINSCHMIDT'S ARCTIC HUNT

Native and Animal Life in the Polar Regions

"A Suffragette Argument in Alaska"

Scientific societies, teachers and the press endorse these pictures as the sensation of the hour.

There is more comedy, pathos and drama in these films than any posed picture ever made.

A revelation of life and affairs in the frigid zone that has never been equalled. An intimate, close-range study of the animal life from the giant Moose to the little Porcupine.

Wonderful scenes of under-water photography, Salmon in great hordes ascending the stream, Polar Bear diving twenty feet under ice cakes.

"Views of walrus and sea lions beggar description," says the President of the National Geographic Society in Washington.

Birds on their rookeries by the thousands. Volcanoes rising out of the sea. Kodiak Bear, a Sulphur Bottom Whale, great herds of Reindeer and Caribou; Icebergs the size of a twenty-story building are seen breaking off the mighty glaciers and hurled into the sea.

Not a single scene has been posed for; the dangers are real, not make believe. The thrills will not easily fade away, but secure return bookings.

These are a few of the countless human-interest subjects shown in six thousand feet of films that have been made up from eighteen thousand feet of negative taken by Capt. Kleinschmidt on his last expedition.

States already sold: California, Oregon, Washington, Nevada, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, State of New York.

Complete line of lithographs from one to twenty-four sheets, lantern slides, enlarged photos of exciting scenes for lobby display, cuts, heralds, lecture and press matter, everything ready for a high-class performance of over two hours. Later you can split the feature into two three-reel features and play the moving picture houses, which you cannot do with any other six-reel feature.

RELIANCE

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 15 (April 27).—Leaving her home for the morning automobile ride, one of the first spots of interest Our Mutual Girl saw was the famous Flatiron Building, only eight feet wide at the point of its triangular base and eighty-eight feet wide at the rear. Margaret's aunt gave her some interesting particulars about the structure as they passed it. Soon Our Mutual Girl arrived at Lord & Taylor's, the newest and most pretentious of Fifth Avenue shops. There she saw the exhibition of Spring gowns displayed by the store's living models. Margaret could not but wonder at the number and beauty of the gowns shown. From there our Mutual Girl took an auto ride through the crowded East Side, always of interest to her. She noticed a young girl, evidently poor, playing a violin in the street and impetuously leaped from the auto. Margaret talked to the little girl and found she was ambitious, but poverty-stricken.

"We are so poor," said the girl, "can't you help us?" Our Mutual Girl handed the little stranger into the automobile, took her home and gave her a new dress. Then Margaret took her to the office of Walter Damrosch, America's most famous conductor-composer. Mr. Damrosch received the little girl kindly and tried the piece of music she had written. "The music in itself is worthless," he told Our Mutual Girl, "but it gives evidence of talent. She shall have a scholarship in the Institute of Music. Here is a letter of introduction which will suffice." That night Margaret dreamed of her days when, as a little country girl on the farm, she played the old melodeon while her mother smoothed her hair.

ASHES OF THE PAST (2 parts—May 2).—Doc Watkins, a sleek gambler, and his wife, Connie, are suspected of fleecing a newcomer in camp. They are escorted to the edge of the town by a committee of citizens and ordered not to come back. Connie is very much broken up. She becomes weary after a while, and cannot go farther. Watkins threatens to leave her. She pleads with him in vain; he jeers, repudiates her, and starts away. She steals up behind him and is about to knife him when both are startled by a noise. Connie conceals her knife.

A young husband and wife with their baby, have come overland from the East in a covered wagon to seek their fortune. When near their goal their tired horses fall, the wagon overturns and rolls down the steep embankment. The father and mother are killed. The baby in its wad of bed clothes is caught behind a rock, and is not hurt. It is the baby crying that Connie and Doc hear. They find it, but cannot see the debris of the wagon or the dead bodies or the parents at the bottom of the gulch. Connie and Watkins rescue the baby and Connie becomes very attached to it. Watkins is then told he can go if he likes and he does. While he is gone, a couple of Mexicans see Connie and the baby alone and fight for her, one being killed. The other attacks her, but Watkins in the meantime has repented and the love for his wife and drawing affection for the child, calls him back and he arrives at the camp just in time to rescue his wife from the Mexican. The two are reunited and decide to give up their gambling life for the sake of the child.

The safe door, being open, is Alfred's opportunity for stealing money While Henry is looking over the check. Alfred is refused and leaves, without Henry discovering the loss. The bank president observes a shortage and asks about it. Henry, to shield his brother, is silent, and the president, believing him guilty, has him arrested. He is sentenced to prison for fifteen years.

Ten years later Henry sees an opportunity to escape from the fort. In making his dash for liberty he is seen by the guards, who open fire on him. Diving into the river, he makes good his escape by swimming under the water. During his imprisonment his wife dies and Alfred takes charge of his daughter, Jennie, now a young lady. Going from bad to worse, Alfred and Jennie drift into the camp of roving gypsies. Jennie is forced to go from door to door selling the baskets made by the gypsies, while Alfred drinks all the money and makes her life miserable with his brutality. One day, while pulling a child from beneath the wheels of a speeding automobile, Jennie is injured and taken in the car to the camp. The young journalist who accompanies her, seeing her surroundings, forces her to tell her story. His interest turns to love, and she runs away to become his wife.

Henry is beginning life anew. He becomes prosperous and is anxious to find his daughter. His advertisement in the papers is seen by Jennie and Alfred. The journalist, thinking it is a scheme to locate and kidnap his wife, advises her to take no notice of it. Alfred, not knowing the whereabouts of Jennie, schemes with one of the gypsies to substitute his daughter for Jennie. Alfred then calls at the hotel, but when he sees his brother, he fears for his own safety and sneaks away. He writes a letter to Henry, asking him to call at the camp. Henry arrives and Alfred falls on his knees and begs for mercy, producing the girl who substitutes for Jennie, making him believe it is his own flesh and blood.

The journalist, to satisfy his own curiosity, decides to answer the advertisement and sends Jennie to see Banker Parker. Henry's assumed name, but finds he has left to sail for America. Jennie's husband visits the gypsy camp and is seen approaching by Alfred. Walking to the wagon, he knocks at the door, and receiving no answer, he enters. Alfred locks him in and pushes the wagon over the steep cliff. Jennie's husband is horribly mangled in the smash and being in such a precarious condition after his arrival at the hospital, Jennie is not allowed to speak to him.

Banker Parker, believing he has found his daughter, takes passage for New York, taking along Alfred. After making inquiries, Jennie finds when they are to sail and decides to follow them on the Imperator, disguised as a man. Finding out a scheme, she later obtains an invitation to a masked ball at Parker's home. She makes an exact duplicate of the costume she wore at the gypsy camp and attends the ball.

Alfred is dumbfounded when he recognizes Jennie and she adds to his discomfort at every opportunity. Jennie, entering Parker's private office, is followed by Alfred. Opening a drawer she discovers proof. When Alfred enters the room, Jennie, to escape, turns off the light. The false Jennie, thinking something is wrong, follows, and coming into the room just as the lights are turned off, is seized by Alfred Thinking it is Jennie, he chokes her to death. The guests rush in and Jennie explains all to her father, and Alfred is taken away to his just punishment

CARDINAL RICHELIEU'S WARD (Six Parts).—Julie de Mortemar, the ward of Cardinal Richelieu, is in love with Adrian de Mauprat, a soldier of fortune. Louis the Thirteenth is in love with her himself, as is also his favorite, Count de Baradas. Cardinal Richelieu, in order to protect his ward from the King, marries her to de Mauprat. Under the influence of Baradas, King Louis issues an order for the annulment of the marriage and demands that she return to court. Baradas conspires with Gaston, Duke de Orleans, a brother of Louis the Thirteenth, to dethrone the King and murder his prime minister, Cardinal Richelieu.

Baradas poisons de Mauprat's mind against Richelieu and induces him to join in the conspiracy against the King. The conspirators attempt to murder Richelieu. De Mauprat enters his chambers at night, but he meets Richelieu, who proves to de Mauprat that Baradas has lied to him in showing that the Cardinal was de Mauprat's enemy. The conspirators are at the door to murder Richelieu, but the Cardinal and de Mauprat trick him by pretending that Richelieu has been strangled in his sleep. The conspirators have sent a document to Count de Baradas, who, at the head of his army, is on the French frontier. This document contains the names of all concerned in the conspiracy. Richelieu, by the aid of his spies, obtains possession of that document, exposes the conspirators to the monarch and assumes his old position at court as the Prime Minister of Louis Thirteenth. The husband of his ward is made to have no regrets for his loyalty in the Cardinal's great time of need.

APEX.

NOT GUILTY (Three Parts).—At Gravelhurst College, where he is being educated for the army, Jack Neville receives a telegram telling him to come home at once as his father is seriously ill. He arrives home too late. After the funeral Jack is called into his father's study by the old family solicitor, where he received the stunning news that his father having died insolvent, he will not be able to continue his studies and that he is practically penniless.

Some days later, Jack, strolling through Trafalgar Square, is accosted by a smart recruiting sergeant. Taking his advice Jack enlists. His life in the regiment is not a bed of roses. Tommy does not take kindly to the gentleman ranker, but after giving the bully of the regiment a good thrashing he becomes more popular. While out walking one day, he manages to save the daughter of the Colonel, whose horse has bolted. Finding she is unhurt, he goes off unobserved. The Colonel, hearing from his daughter the story of the modest hero, decides to reward him when the opportunity occurs. Jack is on sentry when he is recognized and thanked before the guards, who are astonished to see the Colonel and his daughter shaking hands with a private.

Several years elapse and Jack wins speedy promotion. The regiment is ordered on foreign service. During one of the little wars that are always cropping up among the natives of the Indian Northwest frontier, Jack again distinguishes himself by saving the life of his officer while on outpost duty. For this he is again complimented in despatches and recommended for the Victoria Cross. After many months of fighting, the tribes are at last forced into submission and Jack's regiment returns to England, where he is made the hero of the hour. His photograph appears in all the illustrated papers, together with the story of how he won his V. C. and commission, for he is now known as Lieut. Neville, V. C.

He does not seem to have any enemies in the world, until one evening during the regimental ball, he rescues Claire Bridge, the colonel's daughter, from the hands of Captain Strange, who has been forcing his attentions on her. Captain Strange, who is a born gambler, gets into the hands of continental sharps, who decoy him and force him to give his I. O. U. for $5,000. This is the opportunity the gang has been waiting for, knowing that plans of his new fortification are being prepared. They force Captain Strange to swear to secure them under a threat of exposing him as a gambler who cannot pay his debts. Captain Strange thus cornered, consents to secure the plans, and knowing that they are being prepared by Jack, decides to make him the scapegoat, and thus bring about his ruin. A decoy letter is sent to Jack, to get him out of the way, in the meantime Strange has secured duplicate keys, steals the plans and gets clear away. Jack is arrested as a traitor. The Colonel's daughter, hearing of this, will not believe Jack guilty and secretly consults a private detective, to whom she tells her suspicions.

Jack meanwhile is confined to his quarters under guard. During the night a fire breaks out in the officers' quarters. By the time the fire pickets turn out, the place is well alight. The colors being in danger of destruction, the Colonel makes a gallant effort to try and save them. Pushing his way through the crowd of men who try to restrain him from going to his death, he reaches the room and snatches down the precious colors, but his victory is shortlived, for he collapses on reaching the door and falls back unconscious. Jack, who has seen the fire from his room, can contain himself no longer. He dashes past the sentry and reaches the fire to learn that the Colonel has gone in and not yet returned. Without a thought for himself, Jack dashes through the flames and succeeds after a struggle in saving both the Colonel and colors.

During the Captain's absence the detective who suspects him, enters his rooms and obtains clues which prove that the Captain is guilty, but not having sufficient evidence the detective decides to disguise himself as a foreigner, and visit the haunts of the gang. He succeeds in arresting the ring leader and securing the plans. In the meantime, Jack is being tried by Court Martial and the evidence looks very black against him. An interruption is caused by the entry of the detective who produces the missing plans, and at the same time tells the Court that Jack is innocent and pointing out Strange as the guilty party. Strange denies the accusation, but collapses when confronted by the spy, who points him out as the man who gave him the plans. Jack is consequently set free and Strange arrested. The Colonel and all the officers present congratulate Jack. Losing no time he makes his way to the Colonel's house, where he thanks Claire for all the thought and trouble she has taken to prove his innocence. Jack holds his arms out to her, and then folds her in a loving embrace. They are interrupted by the Colonel, who at first pretends to be angry, but finally accepts Jack as his future son-in-law.

QUEEN OF THE FORTY THIEVES (Four Parts).—Parker, the millionaire, having informed the police that he believes an attempt will be made to kidnap his daughter, Alice, warns her to be careful, and the police assign a young detective, Tom Harris, to the case. Harris, in the disguise of a groom goes forth to seek the supposed kidnappers. On his way to the millionaire's mansion, he comes across a man named Jackson, whose actions arouse his suspicions. Deciding to watch him, Harris makes his acquaintance, and invites Jackson to an inn. Miss Parker, out on her daily ride, drives up to the inn, and stepping out, orders her coachman to wait. During her absence, the coachman indulges too freely in drink, and accidentally frightens the steeds, who run away. Tom Harris, by taking a short cut, succeeds in stopping the horses, and offers to drive Miss Parker home. Passing the inn, Alice dismisses the coachman, who vows vengeance. Jackson, who is no other than a lieutenant for the Forty Thieves, hearing this, and seeing an opportunity to gain entrance into the millionaire's mansion, offers to help the dismissed coachman secure his vengeance.

Harris, upon his arrival at the millionaire's house, is offered the position as coachman, and believing he could gain more information by hiding his identity, accepts his offer. That night the discharged coachman and Jackson force an entrance into the house, but are outwitted by Harris, who has watched their movements. They escape, and the millionaire arriving on the scene and finding no trace of the supposed robbers, becomes suspicious of Harris and orders him from the house, but believing he is on the right track of the kidnappers, Harris decides to keep silent. The next day by chance, he sees an advertisement in the paper for reliable men signed by Jackson. On answering the advertisement he is recognized by Jackson, who is seeking recruits for the Forty Thieves. Not knowing Harris' true character, and believing he would make an excellent member of the band, makes him an offer to join, which Harris accepts. Upon arriving at the rendezvous of the bandits, the Queen congratulates Jackson on his choice.

Parker, alarmed at the identity of the bandits, decides to take an extended tour to South America with his daughter. The Queen, seeing a notice to this effect in the papers, orders Jackson to call a meeting of the band, and they decide to make one more effort to secure the girl. Having secured the necessary information, the gang sets out to hold up the train, and leave Harris behind. Surprised at this procedure, Harris asks the Queen to inform him of their destination; upon her refusal in the struggle which ensues, he manages to get possession of the newspaper, which gives him the needed information. Immediately striking the trail of the horses, which leads him to a lonely spot, he comes upon the gang's sentinel, guarding the horses, overpowers him, and appropriates his disguise. Taking part in the holdup of the train, he succeeds in rescuing the girl, and securing two of the gang's horses, escapes. He is discovered by the Queen, who has followed him, and being advised by the sentinel to which direction he has gone, orders the pursuit.

Alice, becoming exhausted, is unable to hold her mount, and Harris lets one horse go and takes her upon his steed, but the increased load is too much for the faithful animal, and they are overcome by the bandits and return with them to their rendezvous, where Alice is locked in an attic room, while Detective Harris is placed in another room at the extreme end of the house. Things are beginning to look bad. Arriving at the next station, the millionaire notifies the officers in charge of a detachment of soldiers on their way to the fort, and they immediately set out in hot pursuit across the country. Tracking the bandits to their rendezvous, they attack the house, and seeing the capture is certain the Queen orders the gang to fire the house. Shot by a stray bullet, she repents, seeks to liberate Tom Harris. Scrambling out of the blazing house, a sight which sears his soul meets his gaze. All around are dead and dying. Outside the troops are endeavoring to force the gates, and the house in which he knew Alice was imprisoned was a mass of roaring flames.

A moment's thought and he goes to the assistance of the soldiers, blowing up the gates and giving them entrance—then he rushes to the house, searches for the room where Alice is imprisoned, and fighting against the overpowering influence of the smoke and flames, he succeeds in climbing with a coil of rope to her assistance. Just in time, another moment and she would have fallen back into that raging furnace. Steadily he attempts the hazardous descent of the rope, but half-way he sees with horror that the flames have licked the rope and it might give way at any time. The soldiers have anticipated this, too, and wait breathlessly with a blanket which they hold in readiness. The last strands of the rope part, and with a thud they fall into the outstretched blanket and are saved. Scarcely had the pair recovered than the millionaire arrived, brought by another detachment of soldiers, and hearing of the courage of his late coachman, gives him his daughter's hand as reward.

HOLYLAND EXHIBITION CO.

LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND (Six Parts).—The first reel shows the departure from the harbor of Odessa, Russia, on the Black Sea. You see the passengers embarking the ship; you pass through the famous Bosporus; you see the ship passing from Constantinople through the Straits of Dardanells until the arrival in the port of Smyrna.

At the close of this scene you find yourself at the harbor of Jaffe in Palestine. You are taken for a stroll through Jaffe and behold the beautiful garden city of Tel-Aviv, which consists exclusively of magnificent villas that are mostly Jewish residences. While in Jaffe you also see the Gymnasium, the Seminary and the Girls' School. You see the scholars at work and at play, you witness the Palisthenis Exercises. Leaving Jaffe you arrive at the colony of Sichren-Jacob and see the colonists homeward bound and at their agricultural work.

After you have been taken through each colony where you see the gathering of Almonds from the trees, you are set on the road to Jerusalem. As you behold the picture you have the illusion of one who is seated on the observation platform of a readily moving train from which you get a complete view of a wonderful landscape. You see the mountains of Judah, the vineyards, the fields of tall cliffs, and vast sun-lit value. On the road to Jerusalem you make a short detour in order to pay a visit to the "Cave of Samson," and a few moments later you suddenly behold the glorious panaraus of Jerusalem.

Of the many interesting pictures that you witness in and around Jerusalem, the most beautiful and most striking is the series entitled "The Wailing Wall." First you see the regions around the Holy Wall, then the narrow passage to the Wall, then the Jews who go there to pray, and finally you see a group of Jews in front of the Wall with their prayer robes on reciting prayers. A sea of sunshine falls on the white group and a tremor of awe thrills one's heart at the sadness and holiness of the scene. In addition, you will see the "Tower of King David," "The Graves of the 72 Sanhedrins"; you also see several pictures of modern and useful institutions of the city.

ED. H. WAGNER.

THE HOSTAGE (Four Parts).—A deformed person with nervous anxiety is looking out to sea, evidently awaiting the arrival of some one. He is a cripple, and presently we become aware that he is the despised member of a band of brigands, and is watching for their return. They arrive in their boats headed by their dreaded chieftan, Beppo. They are in a bad humor, and the unfortunate cripple is kicked and cuffed for no reason, except that he cannot return the blows of his tormentors. The reason is that one of the band has been captured an insult and indignity that Beppo cannot and will not permit. He determines to rescue his man. Bernardi, the chief of police, is a man of strong will power and determination; he has made up his mind to rid the country of the gang of thieves and malefactors, of which Beppo is the chief. But they are illusive, nobody knows where their haunts and huts are. They disappear like magic at the slightest alarm. Bernardi sends out his scouts, and turns from the weary, disappointing details of his official duties to the society of his beautiful, loving wife and joyous play of their little golden-haired daughter. The latter is scarcely more than a baby, but her intelligence is far beyond her years, and it is evident that she is the apple of her father's eye, and that her mother worships the very ground on which she treads.

While standing at the gate, the brigand prisoner is brought along the road, under strong escort. Appealingly he raises his handcuffed hands to Bernadi, who turns away in contemptuous disgust and hurries his dear ones away from the brigand. That night Beppo and his band make an attempt to rescue him. In a human pyramid they form themselves against the prison wall beneath their comrade's cell. A rope is passed from hand to hand, and the attempt is almost successful when they are heard. They are seen and they flee in dismay, leaving their comrade in the hands of the police. There is a fresh pursuit, and again it proves futile—Beppo escapes. He escapes to return to the house of his arch-enemy, Bernadi. A rope is thrown over the balcony and an agile brigand climbs it in a twinkling. He enters the child's bedroom. The mother shrieks and stands paralyzed with terror. She cannot move a muscle. The child is snatched away, and the gang retreats to their island. From there a message is despatched and delivered to Bernadi by a blind child—a messenger who cannot describe the features of his instructor—if the prisoner is not released in three days then the child shall die.

The unfortunate mother is distracted, the father stands his death in impotent rage and instructs his men to make fresh efforts. Time drags on, and Madame Bernardi reaches the limit of her endurance. Having procured the keys, she enters the prison intending to release the prisoner, thereby saving her child's life. Her husband interferes and reproachfully leads her away. Two days are passed. The unhappy mother lies on a bed of sickness, and the brigands cast lots to select the man who shall take the life of the sweet little girl. The cripple draws the fatal lot, and is left to seek his victim and do the deed. The cripple, enraged because of his ill-treatment at the hands of Beppo and his crew, resolves on a very different course of action. He hides the child in a part of the rocky hill that surrounds the island, a part inaccessible except by means of a rope, and makes his way to Bernadi, to whom he offers to deliver his daughter on receipt of $2,000. Bernadi takes valuable securities, hastens to the bank, draws the money, sends it to the cripple and in an incredibly short space of time is seen clambering up the face of the cliff with his beloved child in his arms. Father and daughter be concealed on the island, while the cripple sends a telegram to the police. They come in force and kill and capture most of the gang. Beppo escapes, but comes to grief with his cripple enemy. The two roll, twist, turn, clutch at each other's throats and plunge over the precipice to the sea and rocks below. While Bernadi takes his child home to the mother, whose grief is soon changed to rapture, as she clasps her treasure to her breast.

THE OUTLAW REFORMS (Four Parts).—Bill, the young son of a squatter, while playing at the side of the hill, accidentally discovers silver. Just at this time, Tex, foreman of the Diamond Ranch, comes along and realizes the valuable find that the boy has made, and hastens to file a claim for the land. Bill rushes home to show the bright, shining article to his father, who also realizes the value of the discovery and sends a sample to the Assay office in Washington. Meanwhile, two months elapse and Bill's mother dies. As they are burying her on the hillside, Tex shoots the old man from ambush and steals the silver claim from the boy.

Several years elapse, and the boy, embittered by the hardships of his life, has become an outlaw, and we see him first leading several horses that he has stolen from the Indians. He takes particular delight in spreading terror and eluding capture just for the sheer pleasure it gives him. Hard pressed by the Indians and pursued by the sheriff, he points the arrow of the advancing band of Indians after Tex—and then, with dare-devil effrontery, he helps the sheriff drive them off and makes him an ally. In a spirit of bravado, he holds up a stage coach merely to ask for a chew of tobacco and, later, while pursued by his arch enemy, Tex, and a posse, he succeeds in lassoing Tex and makes him his prisoner, after he has taken his station at the foot of the hills on the lookout for the outlaw. After a series of exciting adventures he again shows his good nature by going to the defense of the stage coach when it is attacked by the Indians. Mary, the sheriff's daughter, is the only passenger in the coach, and when he receives a slight wound, she dresses it. This is the first touch of a woman's hand that he has known since the death of his mother, and it has a most wonderful effect on the outlaw. This is really the beginning of the end of his wild career. He finally accepts a job and starts wooing Mary, ultimately marrying her. During the wedding celebration, Tex, returning for his revenge, encounters Bill and, in a rough and tumble fight, accidentally shoots himself. The story is cleverly worked out during which time the spectator is treated to a series of dare-devilry, sensational riding and hair-breadth escapes, with the interest cleverly sustained from beginning to end.

THE LURE OF MILLIONS (Four Parts).—Von-Muller is a member of the fashionable Jockey Club, loses all his fortune, and is indebted on his I. O. U. to Lang in a large sum, which he is unable to pay. Going to his room he contemplates suicide when his valet is arrested by a letter, which he opens and finds to be an invitation to a masquerade ball from Grace Oberman, a millionaire, and fellow club member. VonMuller resolves to attend. He dons the costume of a beggar. The ball is at its last cotillion when a messenger hands him a note from Lang, reminding him the obligation falls due at midnight. He goes to the conservatory, and is about to end it all, but is intercepted by the host. Oberman tells him he has everything that wealth can give, but he, too, is unhappy. Taking VonMuller to his library, Oberman draws up an assignment of his entire wealth on condition that if after he has gone out into the world a poor man and does not find happiness they shall die together.

VonMuller, nothing to lose, agrees, and Oberman goes out to seek employment. He secures employment in a large wholesale warehouse of which he is later made the foreman. Everything progresses nicely with him. He finds happiness in the love of his landlady's daughter to whom he is betrothed. Then a turn comes, a careless driver drops a lighted match, setting fire to the warehouse; Oberman is imprisoned by the flames and in fighting his way out falls exhausted. He is rescued and taken to the hospital. His right arm has to be amputated. Later he is discharged from the hospital. Every effort to find employment is futile—no one will employ a one-armed man. He writes a farewell note to his sweetheart, and decides to end it all, but remembering his compact with VonMuller, resolves to enforce its terms.

At his old home he learns VonMuller sold the mansion, married and went away. Oberman starts out to find him. At the end of a long day's tramp he seeks shelter in a cheap lodging house. The place is raided. He is arrested as a suspicious character. In the morning he is taken before a Justice of the Peace, and to his surprise he recognizes VonMuller. Oberman demands fulfillment of the contract. VonMuller pleads, saying he has enough money for both, but Oberman is determined. VonMuller secretly presses a button back of him, summoning an officer, whom he orders to take Oberman to a cell. Rushing home, he writes to the other justices, instructing them to release Oberman and to give him 500 francs, which he encloses with the letter.

He and his wife then board a steamer bound for abroad. Oberman traces VonMuller to the ship, and succeeds in boarding it. Locating the exact position of VonMuller's stateroom, he lowers himself to the open port-hole, and leveling a revolver at the sleeping VonMuller, awakens him, and commands him to comply with the terms of the agreement. Terror-stricken, VonMuller takes a revolver, and, pointing it at his own head, fires. With a satisfied grin Oberman drops his pistol, takes a knife from his pocket, and, placing it between his teeth, saws at the rope which holds him up. The rope strains—snaps—then the body plunges down into the raging waters, and is lost to view.

In the last scene we see VonMuller in his room at the club. He awakens from a restless sleep, passes his hand over his forehead, and realizes it was all a dream. He resigns from the club, and starts a new life.

THE DELAWARE WHIPPING POST (Three Parts).—Mrs. Raleigh, wife of Wm. Raleigh, cashier of the City Bank, is an extravagant, selfish woman living beyond her husband's income. The consequence: An unhappy home, the husband spending his leisure hours at the club. Contrasted with this, we see the home of Howard Mason, a poor workman. It is a happy home with a devoted wife and mother, saving every cent possible to pay off the mortgage.

The story opens with breakfast in the Raleigh home. Mrs. Raleigh urging her husband for more money. Then we see breakfast in the happy home. Mason and his son, Billy, finish breakfast and with their dinner pails and a loving kiss, start for work at the factory. In the evening when Raleigh reaches home, he finds his wife and daughter nearly finished with their dinner. Angered at this, he starts for the club. Closing time at the factory. Mason and Billy find Mrs. Mason and the little girl waiting with a nice warm dinner ready for them.

Two months later Raleigh, having lost heavily in poker and being hounded at home for more money, in a vain effort to get it, robs the bank, and escapes. The bank is closed in consequence of this theft, and hundreds of depositors are made penniless. Not only does Mason lose the money which he had saved to pay off the mortgage, but the factory is forced to close on account of the bank having called in the factory paper, which they hold.

A month later, Mason returns home disheartened after a days unsuccessful search for work, only to find the mortgage is to be foreclosed the next day, and his little girl's shoes entirely worn out. He makes a firm resolve to get work at any cost. In his vain effort, he passes a store and sees a pair of shoes that will just fit his child's feet; he is tempted and steals them. The proprietor, watching through the window, calls the police and Mason is arrested.

About the same time Raleigh is captured in New York. Mason is tried, found guilty and sentenced to ninety days in jail with twenty lashes. Raleigh is brought into court and released on bail. On another instance, being intoxicated and upbraided by his wife, he beats her. Mrs. Raleigh telephones for the police and has Raleigh arrested. He pleads guilty to wife beating, and is fined fifty dollars and costs. The same day Mason receives twenty lashes at the Whipping Post, and starts to serve his ninety days for stealing a pair of shoes. Raleigh grows desperate at the thought of his coming trial for his lowly crime, and ends his trouble and shame with death.

RAMO

THROUGH DANTE'S FLAMES (Four parts—April 24).—Kate Clarke and her brother, Joe, are alone in the world. Kate learns of her brother's connection with a counterfeiter's gang only when the police invade their rooms to arrest Joe. After a desperate struggle, Joe escapes, but Kate is seriously injured by an accidental blow. She recovers, but the memory of her past is gone. Kate wanders away to the city and becomes a cabaret dancer. Richard Harris, a noted artist, has a vision of creating a "Madonna," but has been unable to secure a suitable model. While visiting the cabaret, he sees in Kate the model he seeks and she consents to pose for the painting. As the painting progresses, Harris' interest ripens into love, but this only amuses her. At length, bored by posing, she suddenly goes away. The painting is yet unfinished. Harris, heartbroken over his loss, pours out the whole story in a letter to his twin brother, Joseph, a minister.

Meanwhile the train which Kate had taken is wrecked near the village where Harris' brother is both pastor and physician to his flock. Interested in Kate's peculiar case, he has removed her to his home. The shock has blotted out entirely the memory of the past few years of her life as a dancer, nor does she remember how she came to be aboard the train—she recalls only her life before her first injury. The artist meanwhile has made futile attempts to finish "Madonna." Broken in health and despondent he sends for his brother. One day, in his delirium, seeing Kate before his eyes, he finishes the painting. The brother arrives too late, but recognizing Kate as the original of the "Madonna" he takes it back home and hangs it in the church.

During the minister's absence, Jane Perkins, one of his parishioners who is jealous of his attentions to Kate, finds the letter which the artist has written to his brother. She reads it and learns the tragic story of the artist and the girl who posed for the picture, the "Madonna." Kate's brother, Joe, unrepentant, is still a counterfeiter and a member of a gang located near this village. Kate and Joe meet, but he begs her not to disclose his identity or whereabouts. Unfortunately, Jane sees the affectionate parting and straightway starts a scandal. A bazaar fete is in progress in the church rooms, and while some of the congregation are admiring the "Madonna," Jane discloses Kate's past, and thus for the first time the girl, who overhears it, cruelly learns the story of her lost few years. The church members turn against her, but the minister defends her.

By impersonating one of the members of the church, Fagin, a detective, captures all of the gang except Joe, who takes refuge in the church. He is tracked there and accidentally upsets a small stove, setting fire to the church. Badly injured, Joe crawls to the place where his sister is now living. The minister rescues Kate. The "Madonna" is practically the only article which escapes the flames. Kate, returning home, finds Joe. His condition requiring medical attention, she summons the minister, who remains through the night with Joe. Pledged to keep Joe's presence a secret, the minister is unable to answer the elder's demand for explanations. Joe dies and the gossiping villagers soon learn the truth. The minister presents the "Madonna" to a Metropolitan Art Gallery where the public flock to see it. Though they may not know it, they are looking at the perfect likeness of the minister's present wife and child.

THE STAIRCASE OF DEATH (Three parts).—Admiral Trent and his niece, Sybil, are spending some weeks in Paris at a fashionable hotel. Sybil is an orphan and her uncle's heiress, which is known to Jack Burgess, an adventurer. One day Sybil, accompanied by her companion, goes shopping. The companion has been bribed by Burgess, and she conceals valuable laces in Sybil's muff. Sybil is accused of shoplifting. Burgess intervenes and saves her from a very unpleasant position. Full of gratitude, she thanks and invites him to meet her uncle. Some weeks pass, and the friendship ripens. Sybil falls desperately in love with Burgess and meets him secretly, she also writes many compromising letters to her lover, trusting him implicitly. At a dinner party Burgess is introduced to one of the Admiral's friends, a Mr. Pascal, who is a wealthy art collector. Burgess determines to profit by the introduction, and persuades Sybil to make an arrangement for Mr. Pascal to visit his house at Auteuil, telling her he has a valuable statuette he wishes to offer the collector. Sybil agrees to bring Mr. Pascal over the next afternoon in her motor-brougham, and Burgess lays his plans. At his house he carries a bronze statue to the top of a wide staircase and arranges it on a pedestal, and with an accomplice awaits his visitors. When they arrive, Sybil is detained in conversation by Burgess's friend, while Mr. Pascal, accompanied by Burgess, proceeds to inspect the curio. The collector runs up the stairs ahead of his host, who steps to the wall and pulls a thick cord. Instantly the stairs revolve, precipitating the unfortunate Mr. Pascal into a cellar through which the Seine flows. Burgess coolly reverses the staircase and returns to Sybil, to whom he tells a plausible story to account for Mr. Pascal's absence. Two days later the collector's body is found in the river a few miles from Auteuil, and the large sum of money known to have been in his possession is missing from his pocket. Sybil has an appointment with her lover that night in the garden, but on meeting him she dare not voice her suspicions. Burgess is now becoming desperate, and he no longer cares to keep up his pretence before Sybil. He orders her to obtain the key to her uncle's safe, threatening to give her letters to the admiral if she refuses. Ter-forged by the scoundrel, Sybil yields and Burgess gets away with a large sum of money. The robbery is placed in the hands of Barnet Parker, the celebrated detective. He is convinced by Sybil's manner that she knows something of the theft, and he determines to watch her. A bent hairpin affords a certain clue. Meanwhile, Burgess has planned to leave the country; he writes to Sybil, telling her to bring him $1,000 that night, in exchange for which he will give her the letters. She leaves the house and hails a taxi to drive to Auteuil. The detective arranges that, unknown to Sybil, he is her chauffeur. Arriving at the house, Sybil enters. Barnet Parker follows a few minutes later and overhears enough to understand that Sybil is in Burgess's power before his presence is noticed. To escape he runs up the fatal staircase, and Burgess sends another victim to destruction. By a lucky chance, the detective's coat catches in the stairs, and the force of his fall is broken. Being an expert swimmer, he escapes death, and leaving traces behind him, returns to await further developments. A few hours later he is rewarded, the window of his study is cautiously opened, and the dummy he has taken pains to prepare receives a dagger in its back. Burgess and his accomplice are captured, and although the story of their infamy becomes public, Barnet Parker keeps Sybil's secret even from the admiral.

AMERICAN KINETO CORP.

A WOMAN'S TREACHERY (Three parts).—Count Zachin, a Russian noble, has been left a widower. He is governor of his province and is loved and respected by the peasantry. Ivan Dandoff, a faithful servant of the castle, loves the count's children, a boy and a girl. One day a lady visitor arrives with a letter of introduction from the count's brother. Knowing that the children need a governess, he recommends Sonia Czernowska, the bearer of the letter. The count is impressed by the appearance of his visitor and decides to engage her. The children immediately take a dislike to the new governess, a feeling which is shared by Ivan.

A great change is immediately noticeable in the home life of the castle. The count loses his melancholy and it is apparent that he is fascinated by the charming governess. The children are no longer unruly when in the presence of Sonia, as they are in reality afraid of her, but when in the company of their beloved Ivan, their natural flow of spirits have full play. One day, the count, who is a keen huntsman, goes hunting in his forests. His horse accidentally treads in a hole, causing a serious accident to its master. Amid excitement and confusion, a hurdle is hurriedly improvised as a stretcher and the injured count is taken home. The doctor pronounces his condition critical and states that he will probably be lame for life.

Sonia attends the sick man, and as he gradually recovers from his injury, his passion for the girl increases and he decides to make her his wife. She agrees to marry him. Ivan is the least surprised, as he has closely watched Sonia scheming. She is elated at her success, which has resulted in her marriage to a wealthy man whom she thinks cannot live very long. Sonia is cruel to the children and one day Ivan, who keeps her under close observation, intervenes and prevents her from ill-treating them. Maddened by the servant's interference, she determines to get rid of him, and prevails upon the count to dismiss him.

Ivan bids a pitiful farewell to his playmates. He has not proceeded far when he meets a stranger, who inquires his way to the castle. Instinctively Ivan connects him with Sonia and after pointing the way, follows at a distance.

Ivan's vigilance is rewarded as he sees the stranger write a note which is sent by messenger to the castle. The reply gives the stranger satisfaction. He tears the note in pieces and throws them to the floor. Ivan, remaining behind, picks up the pieces and discovers that Sonia has made an appointment with the stranger. At the appointed time, Ivan keeps watch and has his suspicions confirmed by seeing Sonia and the stranger embrace. Jealous of his master's honor, the implacable Russian plans revenge. When Sonia leaves her lover, Ivan rushes upon the unfortunate man, binds him securely, carries him to the kennels and throws him in the midst of the half-starved hounds. Just as the door is secured, Sonia appears on the scene. She realizes the horror of the situation and struggles with Ivan to rescue her lover, biting him severely on the hand, but Ivan, is deaf to, holding on the door until the dogs have carried out his vengeance.

Eight years elapse. The count has aged and still carries signs of his accident. Sonia is more alluring than ever and enjoys life in the South with her husband. She is surrounded by admirers and carries on endless flirtations.

One of the guests at the hotel is a baron, who Sonia particularly favors. Sonia is tired of the bond that ties her to the count and falls in with the baron's suggestion that her husband be disposed of as soon as he has made the will in her favor. The two mature their plans, but are all the time secretly watched by the mysterious stranger. The baron writes particulars of his plot to Sonia, which she forgetfully leaves in the summer house. The stranger, always on the watch, finds out and swears to thwart the two villainous schemers. Sonia recovers her letter and later is attracted by the mysterious stranger with whom she eventually converses. Her suspicions are aroused and she identifies the stranger as Ivan. He shows her the scar left by the bite on his wrist and she becomes terror-stricken. The baron invites the count and Sonia for a day's duck shooting. At a critical moment, the count, through a pre-arranged plan, falls overboard and is left to drown. Ivan, however, had, during the previous night, dropped from a high bridge on to the boat and plunges into the lake to rescue his master. The baron and Sonia, not being aware of his presence, Ivan takes his master to a cottage nearby, where he reveals his identity and tells him of the diabolical plot upon his life. The count realizes the character of his wife. He readily listens to Ivan's suggestion to keep in seclusion for a time and leave the wicked plotters to believe that the said scheme has been successful. Sonia discovers her husband's will and finds that everything absolutely is left to her.

Preparations are made for an immediate departure, but when everything is ready, Ivan appears with some police officers. The two are arrested for attempted murder and taken away to receive just punishment for their crime. The count and Ivan return to Russia to be a warm welcome of the peasantry and to the children now grown to manhood and womanhood.

ESCAPED FROM SIBERIA.—The story opens in a typical Russian Kabaek, or inn. The peasantry are enjoying a rollicking country dance. It is attended by a dissolute Russian officer and his companion who, under the influence of vodka, insult the daughter of the Jewish inn-keeper. The young Count Borris, son of the Governor-General of Kiev, happens to be there seeking shelter from the storm which is raging outside. He protects the young Jewess from the insult of the drunken officers, and throws them out. They return during the night to make trouble for the inn-keeper, and Count Borris, rising from his bed, again saves them from persecution. Love springs up between the young girl and Count Borris. In the meantime Ossip, the son of the inn-keeper, has joined the secret order of the Nihilists. When the order is raided by the secret police Ossip is entrusted with the papers of the organization. When taken to task by his father for becoming a member of the organization, he admits that he is a Nihilist.

The Russian officer, who Count Borris drove from the inn, spreads the report which reaches the Governor-General that the inn-keeper's family are suspected of being Nihilists; he is instructed to act as spy in the Nihilist's den. He brings the news to the Governor that there is a secret order of Nihilists in Kiev. The place is raided, but the son of the inn-keeper manages to save the papers which he gives to his father. The father and son are arrested and brought before the Governor. The father takes the blame, and is sentenced to hard labor in Siberia.

In the meantime, Count Borris has become very much in love with the daughter of the sentenced inn-keeper and meets her clandestinely. He is spied upon by some of his father's officers, who tell the Governor that Count Borris is being bewitched by a Jewess. The Governor-General accuses his son, who admits that he loves the girl. He is then degraded by having the insignia of his rank torn from his uniform. Burning his bridges behind him, he seeks out Ossip, his sweetheart's brother, and asks him to enlist him in the cause. They put him through a terrible test, but he shows his manhood by refusing to turn informer on his new friends.

The scene changes to the terrible march of the Nihilist prisoners under the guard of Russian soldiers across the frozen steppes. The Nihilists, acting on the information they received by secret means, draw lots to assassinate the Minister of Interior, who is to be present at the coming Embassy Ball. The Nihilists successfully carry out a spectacular explosion, causing a fire to break out in the palace. After awful privations, some of them through the assistance of Count Borris escape. Among the fortunate ones are the inn-keeper, his wife and daughter, who reach a place of comparative safety. With the aid of a loyal family servant, who drives them at breakneck speed across the snow, they reach a port and embark on a ship which takes them safely to God's Land of Liberty.

FEATURES IDEAL.

BY POWER OF ATTORNEY; or THE MYSTERY OF JACK HILTON (Three Parts).—Jack Hilton, naval lieutenant, has fallen in love with Adriana Duncan, a wild beast tamer, but his relatives refuse to sanction the marriage owing to the poverty and to the humiliating occupation of his fiancee. In despair, Milton appeals for the last time to his eccentric old uncle, Marquis Hilton, who threatens to alter his will in favor of another if he persists in his mad intention. A fortnight later, in spite of this determined opposition, the marriage is celebrated. Furious at this disobedience, the Marquis is in the act of disinheriting his nephew when his old complaint seizes him and he dies without having time to change his will.

Jack is ordered out to conduct an expedition into the interior of India with a view to discovering the unknown sources of the "Sacred River" of Belopore. Sadly he takes leave of his young bride and sets out upon his journey. In the train he meets Thomas Trevalny, his old school friend, and on board the liner, a few minutes before the departure, he receives the news of his uncle's unexpected death and of his own inheritance. In great haste, Hilton entrusts the important documents to Trevalny, saying that he will send the power of attorney from Calcutta. Left alone, Trevalny determines to gain possession of his friend's valuable inheritance, and gains admittance into his house as gardener in order to intercept the letters from the East, and also Hilton's power of attorney. Trevalny succeeds in his villainous plan, and, while poor Adriana is still waiting for news of her husband, he becomes master of the fortune by means of the intercepted power of attorney.

At last Jack Hilton and his expedition are bivouacing on the banks of the "Sacred River". The Rajah, however, an unrelenting foe of all Europeans, is informed of their intrusion, and sends his fanatic soldiers to attack the encampment. Overwhelmed by a superior force, the Europeans are almost all massacred, and Hilton himself is taken prisoner. The Rajah himself condemns the unfortunate man to be burned alive, but, at the entreaty of his favorite Federah, he imprisons him for life. Meanwhile Adriana has become poor once more, and believes her husband to be dead. A son is born, of whose existence the father knows not, and Adriana is compelled to devote herself once again to her old profession of wild beast tamer in a menagerie to provide food for her child.

At Belopore, the Rajah observes Federah's nightly visits to the European's prison, and the unfortunate Jack Hilton is thrown into the Court of Lions. Federah, however, persuades the faithful Pipel to save her lover, and he flees from Belopore to his safety. Trevalny, who loves Mrs. Hilton, comes one day to force his will upon her, and is driven from the house by the unexpected arrival of one of her leopards. Furious at his failure, he buys the menagerie where Adriana is employed, and writes a letter to her, announcing his fixed intention, either to realize his desire or to drive her into the streets with her little son. Helpless, Ariana comes to appeal to his better feelings.

That same evening, after two years' absence, Jack Hilton returns home, finds the threatening letter, and guesses the danger of his wife's position. Without losing a moment, he runs to Trevalny's mansion, and bursts into the drawing room where the scoundrel is trying to seduce his wife. With a terrible cry he hurls himself upon the traitor but, at his wife's prayer, restrains his fury until the arrival of the police. So, after so many sufferings, Hilton and his wife embrace once more, while Trevalny awaits the punishment he well deserves.

FILM RELEASES OF AMERICA.

THE BLACK TRIANGLE.—Lydia Vengar goes to bed much depressed by her father's refusal to countenance the suit of Raoul Bardy for her hand. Silently three masked men enter through a window. They carry out Lydia, knocking over her new camera in their flight. Webb, a celebrated detective is engaged and, in answer to a letter demanding a ransom for Lydia's return, instructs her father to put a bundle of counterfeit money in a box at the place designated. A dog comes sniffing about, takes the box in his mouth, scampers away and is lost to the pursuers.

It is learned that three men took part in the abduction as the camera in falling to the ground took an accidental snapshot. Webb advertises for a butler, feeling sure that one of the three will be sent to keep watch on him and to do worse. In a series of moves Webb learns that the supposed servant actually is a member of the band. The detective foils efforts to poison him and later to asphyxiate him. Supposing Webb in the grave, the crook servant goes to the rendezvous of the gang closely trailed by Webb. Webb enters by means of a rope and going down the chimney is attracted by the sound of voices. Three men are in conference. The late servant is telling his confederates that he has killed off their dangerous foe.

Webb emerges the chimney cautiously after two of the men have left the room and creeps up behind the remaining conspirator. In a champagne cooler, the conspirator sees Webb's reflection and turning quickly gets the "drop" on the detective, with the revolver at his hip pointing upward. There is no sound but the conspirator topples over. It was an either revolver which was fired from pressure of the trigger. Webb hides the insensible man in the fire-place and searches for the imprisoned girl.

Meanwhile the other two conspirators have gone back into the room where their confederate is lying insensible in the fireplace. One throws his cigar into the fireplace. It flames up and the smoke restores the stupified man to consciousness. The three, thoroughly alarmed, go after Webb, and trap him in the room with the girl. When he pursues an apparent means of escape, they release a trap door and he falls into a well. The water rises higher and higher and it is only by cleverness consummate that he extricated himself.

Hiding under the seat, Webb overhears the conspirators' plans to take the captive to another hiding place. Webb slips out to intercept the chauffeur of the automobile which is to convey them. He overpowers him and after a quick change of make-up, stations himself at the wheel. Feigning accident to the car by a trick, he drives off with the girl, who he restores to her parents. Here he also kills two birds with one stone by unmasking Vengar's supposed servant, who is in reality one of the three kidnappers. With policemen he then rounds up the remaining two.

SAFETY FIRST
Join the "safety first" movement and install the Alhambra Automatic Douser on your machines and be safe. It operates when the film breaks or the take-up refuses to work properly. It is simple in construction and does not interfere with the operation of the machine. You do not need an expert mechanic to install it. Write for circular and be convinced. See Endorsement by F. H. As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat any-more since the was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

WE have returned from the "Coast" to tell you of more theatres on Broadway and its tributaries, using motion pictures exclusively or as a part of their entertainment.

The Herald Square, Broadway and Republic theatres must be added to those previously mentioned, as the homes of many musical and dramatic successes, now using motion pictures and Power's Service.

The use of Power's Cameragraph No. 6A, in the projection of high-class pictures, has become as much a necessary part of animated picture development, as the themes and scenic effects of our best known dramatic and musical producers.

Excitement—thrills—heart throbs—intrigue—punches—suspense—hair raising situations—wild animals—and hundreds upon hundreds of savages in a terrific battle—all these things are crowded into the fourth installment of "Lucille Love," making it the most expensive 2-reel feature ever produced. The battle of the savages is something wonderful. Other thrills include the burning of a hut in the midst of a village, a ride for life and honor through an animal-infested jungle, and finally, with a crash, the horse and rider (Lucille Love) fall into a monster pit. The fall actually kills the horse and renders Lucille unconscious. It will make your audience sit up and gasp! Nothing on the market compares with
